Salvador, sal-vá-dor a republic of Central America, bounded N. by Honduras, NW by Guatemala, from which it is in part separated by the Rio Pan, SE. by the Gulf of Fonseca (which separates it from El Salvador), and S. by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 8130 sq. m. (officially claimed to be 13,150 sq. m.). Its coast-line extends 300 miles and is deeply indented, particularly in the SE., by several good harbors, of which the most frequented are La Unión, the roadstead of Libertad, and Acajutla. The surface from the shore N. for about 15 miles is moderately low and level but it shortly after becomes broken and rugged and is traversed by mountain-groups, giving it a wild appearance. This is increased by the presence of a considerable number of volcanoes, none of which exceeds 8000 feet in height. Among those that have been most active in historic times are Santa Ana, Quetzaltepec, San Miguel, Conchagua, Conchagua, and Icalco, the last-named formed towards the close of the eighteenth century and almost continuously active since. Ilopango, formed in the basin of Lake Ilopango in 1890, has almost disappeared. The largest river is the Lempa, which, issuing from the Lake of Guaymas, flows SE., forming part of the boundary between Salvador and Honduras. The next in magnitude are the Pan and the San Miguel. Other smaller streams are numerous and important as furnishing the means of irrigation. Lake Guaymas on the Guatemala boundary is about 16 miles long by 5 miles broad, and Lake Ilopango, 5 miles E. of the town of San Salvador, is 6 miles long by 3 miles broad. Numerous mineral and thermal springs occur in many quarters. The variations of temperature are considerable. But, on the whole, the country is healthy. Earthquakes are very frequent, especially in the region of the capital city which has been wrecked eleven times since the middle of the sixteenth century.

The soil possesses great fertility and the state is very highly cultivated. The most important crop was for a long time indigo, but it is now little grown. The chief crop is coffee, of which the product in 1901 amounted to 55,000,000 pounds. Other products are rubber, sugar and tobacco, and some cotton. The port of the coast between Acajutla and Libertad is famous for producing the balsam of Peru. The mineral deposits include those of gold, silver, copper, iron and mercury and there are about 100 mines in operation. The affairs of the state are administered by a president, elected for four years and assisted by a cabinet of 4 members and by a single legislative chamber. The republic is divided into 14 departments: San Salvador, La Libertad, Sonsonate, Ahuachapán, Santa Ana, Chulatenango, Cuscatlán, Cabañas, San Miguel, Morazan, La Unión, Usulután, Volcans, and La Paz. Capital San Salvador. Pop. in 1902, 1,006,848. Salvador was subject to Spain until 1821. From 1823 to 1839 it formed part of the republic of Central America, on whose dissolution it became an independent republic.

San Francisco d'Alburo, sán frān-ches-kó dāl-bá-ro an eastern suburb of Genoa. Pop. in 1901, 21,200.

San Francisco, a city of California, the largest city on the Pacific coast of America, and the cosmopolitan emporium of the state. Lat. of Davidson Observatory 37° 47' 28" N. Lon. 122° 26' 42" W. It is coextensive with the county of San Francisco and has an area of 47 sq. m. It occupies the end of a peninsula or tongue of land, with the ocean on one side and the bay of San Francisco on the other. The city is uneven embracing many hills, of which the highest, known as the Twin Peaks are 925 feet high and form an amphitheatre background to the built-up portion of the city. Several of these hills are traversed by residential streets from which magnificent prospects over the surrounding country with the bay and ocean can be had. Systems of cable and electric railways pass over the hills to the ocean beach on the W. where, from the famous resort known as the Cliff House and the Sutter Heights, a magnificent view of the Seal Rocks and the Pacific Ocean is obtained.

The entrance from the Pacific Ocean to the bay of San Francisco is through the Golden Gate, a water way with a strikingly beautiful and picturesque setting, about 5 miles long and 1 mile wide. The bay itself extends from Fort Point past the city in a southeasterly direction for about 40 miles and northward expands into San Pablo Bay at the NE end of which is Mare Island with a national navy yard. Nearly in front of the city are Alcatraz Angel and Yerba Buena (or Goat) islands. The entrance to the harbor is defended by Fort Point, which is on the S. shore of the Golden Gate, and by fortifications on Angel and Alcatraz islands. A government military reservation the Presidio occupies a portion of the N. end of the peninsula. See SAN FRANCISCO BAY.

The city was originally built of wood but the earlier constructions have been in the main swept away by successive conflagrations. Most of the houses remain of wood, however and in 1900 there were less than 4000 buildings constructed of brick and stone. Of recent years many large and costly buildings have been erected, and marble, granite, and terra-cotta have come into extensive use, with interior frames of iron and steel. The most notable public edifices are the city hall a vast pile erected on Yerba Buena Park in 1892-95 at an expenditure of upward of $5,000,000 the new post-office, a granite building costing about $3,000,000 Hall of Justice, custom house, national mint, the building of the Society of California Pioneers, stock and merchandise exchanges, and the vast Ferry Building with collections illustrating the economic and mining resources of the state, Alaskan ethnology etc. Among the educational institutions are the Hopkins Art Institute, the Academy of Sciences, Memorial Museum (Ir. Golden Gate Park) Mechanics Institute public library Patrol library (containing some 200,000 volumes) California School of Mechanical Arts, Cooper Medical College, Cogswell Polytechnic College, College of Notre Dame, Sacred Heart Academy and Irving Institute. The medical and legal departments of the University of California are also located here.

The chief commercial thoroughfare is Market Street, which has a length of about 3½ miles. Of the residential quarters the most distinguished are Nob Hill of California Street, and the Pacific Heights. The largest of the city's parks is Golden Gate Park which covers an area of 1060 acres. Originally a barren tract of sand-dunes, it has been gradually converted into one of the most attractive parks in the country.

The climate of San Francisco is mild and, on the whole, healthy. The record for 30 years shows the average annual rainfall to be 21-25 inches, the mean temperature 56° the average monthly maximum temperature 63° and the average minimum temperature 51°. The highest temperature recorded was 109° the lowest 29°. Little rain falls during the summer months, or between June and October and during this period a disagreeable day well coming through the Golden Gate is apt to blow across the strait. Most of the railroads that communicate with the city terminate on the bay of San Francisco, where they are directly connected with the city by ferries.

Ship building (including the construction of the largest battle-ships) sugar refining the manufacture of foundry and machine-shop products, slaughtering and packing and fruit-canning are among the more important of the city's diversified industries. The value of the manufactured product in 1900 was $134,000,000. San Francisco although no longer the only important port of the Pacific coast, has a most extensive shipping commerce, both with foreign and domestic ports, the shipments of treasure, wheat, liquor, and lumber, and receipts of sugar coffee, and tea being particularly heavy. Regular lines of steamships connect the city with Japan, China, Hawaii, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, Mexico, and the Central and South American ports.

The first white settlement at San Francisco Bay was established in 1776, when an Indian mission (San Francisco de Asis) was founded by the Spaniards. Sixty years later the little village of Yerba Buena sprang up on the shores of the bay. This place took the name of San Francisco in 1847. The discovery of gold in 1848 attracted hosts of immigrants from all parts of the world to California, and San Francisco, which was their landing place, suddenly developed into a busy city. In the early part of 1849 the population was about 2000. By the end of the year it had increased to 20,000. The place was incorporated as a city in 1856. The population in 1900 was 56,862; in 1870 149,473; in 1880 225,959; in 1890 298,997; in 1900 342,732. [Postscript: Was greatly damaged by earthquake and fire, April, 1906.]

Sardinia, sá-rá-dí-ná (It. Sardegna sá-dín-yá Gr. Sarō Sardo L. Sardina) the largest island in the Mediterranean Sea after Sicily, forming with some neighbouring small islands, the principal of which are Sant'Antioco, San Pietro Asinara, Maddalena, and Caprera, a component of the kingdom of Italy. It lies about 115 miles (where the distance is least) SW of the Italian peninsula, and extends from lat. 38° 5' to 41° 15' N., greatest length, from Cape Teulada, in the S. to Punta del Falcone, in the N. 170 miles; greatest breadth, about 80 miles. Area, including the small islands along the coast, 9396 sq. m. It is nearly in the form of a parallelogram, but not without considerable indentations, including the Gulf of Cagliari in the S., the Gulf of Oristano in the W. and the Gulf of Arzachena in the NW. On the N. it is separated from the island of Corsica by the Strait of Bonifacio, about 7 miles wide in its narrowest part.

The coast is rugged and precipitous, presenting a succession of headlands. Among the capes on the E. coast are Figari and Comiso, at the SE corner of the island is Cape Carbonara, near the extreme S is Cape Spartivento, and among the headlands on the W coast is the lofty Cape dell'Argentario. Sardinia is in great part covered with mountains, the mountain mass of Gennargentu, a little E. of the center of the island, rising over 6000 feet above the level of the sea (Pardo Crapaz, 5617 feet). There are several extensive and fruitful plains, the largest, called Campidano, stretching diagonally across the southern part of the island from the Gulf of Oristano to that of Cagliari. There are numerous precipitous streams, some of considerable length. The Gulf of Oristano receives the river Tiro, and the Gulf of Cagliari, the river Sannuri. The rivers Flaminio and Mannu empty on the E. coast. About one-fourth of the surface is covered with forests. The soil is fertile, but methods of cultivation are very primitive. The holdings are very small. Wheat is extensively raised and much attention is given to the production of wine. Other agricultural products are olives, oranges, lemons, and tobacco. There are large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats. The SW part of the island is a metalliferous region yielding lead, zinc, silver, antimony, etc. Among the wild animals in the mountains (or wild sheep) the island suffers greatly from malarial fever. The Sardinians represent a mixture of Italian blood with that of various nationalities. They are for the most part a simple sturdy rustic folk, very short of stature. The dialects spoken in some parts approach the Spanish. Education is very backward. At the head of the educational institutions are the universities of Cagliari and Sassari. The exports include wine, minerals, salt, olives and olive oil, tunny fish, grain, cheese, charcoal, etc. The principal port is Cagliari. There are several hundred miles of railway. Sardinia comprises two provinces, named from the two chief towns Sassari and Cagliari. Pop. in 1901 791,754. Capital Cagliari.

History.—The Carthaginians made themselves masters of part of Sardinia but soon after the first Punic War (264-241 a. c.) they were forced to relinquish the island to the Romans. In the first half of the Middle Ages it was in the possession successively of the Vandals, Greeks, and Saracens. The Pisans and Genoese expelled the Moors, and for a time the Pisans were in possession. In 1258 it became subject to Aragon. By the treaties of 1713-14, the island passed from Spain to Austria. In 1796 Austria ceded it to Savoy in exchange for Sicily and it has ever since formed part of the dominions of the house of Savoy. Sardinia, Kingdom or state which existed previous to the foundation, in 1860-61 of the present kingdom of Italy of which it was the nucleus. It was ruled by the house of Savoy and comprised Piedmont, Savoy, Nice, Liguria, and the island of Sardinia. Victor Amadeus II., duke of Savoy received Sicily from Spain at the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701-13). In 1736 he obtained Sardinia from Austria in exchange for Sicily and created his dominions into the kingdom of Sardinia. The house of Savoy was stripped of its possessions on the mainland by the French at the time of the Revolution, but in 1814-15 it recovered them and obtained in addition the territories of the former republic of Genoa (Liguria). In 1861 Victor Emmanuel II. of Sardinia, having united all Italy, with the exception of Venetia and part of the Papal States, under his sway assumed the title of King of Italy. In the preceding year Savoy and Nice had been separated from the dominions of the house of Savoy and transferred to France.

Savannah, a city of Georgia, the second in population, a port of entry and capital of Chatham co. is on the Savannah River, 18 miles from the sea. The city, which is entered by the Atlantic Coast Line, the Seaboard Air Line, the Savannah and Statesboro, the Southern and the Central of Georgia Rs., has a fine harbor and its wharves are accessible to vessels drawing 24 feet. It is built chiefly upon an elevated plain 40-50 ft. above low water and is handsomely laid out, having towards the centre the beautiful Forsyth Park, with its attractive vegetation of pines, palm-trees, oleanders, camellias, jasmines, magnolias, and cacti, and its southern continuation the Parade Ground, containing the Confederate War Monument. The numerous shaded streets and unobtrusive squares, of which there are nearly 30 in the heart of the city have given to it the name of Forest City.

The more notable public buildings comprise the city hall (or City Exchange), the federal building, custom house, county court-house, Roman Catholic cathedral, Telfair Acad. of Arts and Sciences, Telfair Hospital, Hodgson Hall (containing the collections and library of the Georgia Historical Society), and public library. The city has numerous charitable and benevolent institutions. Among its sculptural works are monuments to Pulaski and Sergeant Jasper (both of whom fell at the siege of Savannah in 1779) and that to General Nathaniel Greene. Savannah ranks fourth among the ports of the Atlantic coast of the United States the foreign commerce for the year 1901 having been valued at nearly $48,000,000. It is the first naval-stores port in the world and it is the leading cotton port on the South Atlantic coast. The shipments of timber, rice and phosphate are also very heavy. The city's industries comprise the manufacture of locomotives, railway-cars, fertilizers, shoes, cotton-seed oil, patent medicines, etc.

Savannah was founded by General James Oglethorpe in 1733 and was chartered as a city in 1739. It was taken by the British in Dec. 1778. The Americans and French assaulted the place with disastrous results on Oct. 9, 1779. It was evacuated by the British in 1783. Savannah was occupied by General Sherman on Dec. 31, 1864. Its population in 1860 was 15,212. In 1880 22,292. In 1870 26,255. In 1890 30,709. In 1900, 42,189. In 1900, 54,244.

Savo, sl-vô (It. Savona or Savona sl-vô-nâ Fr. Savona sl-vô-nâ L. Sapundia and Subsundia) a region in the SE. part of France, formerly one of the divisions of the kingdom of Savoy. It is bounded on the N. by Switzerland from which, in that direction, it is in great part separated by the Lake of Geneva, and on the E. by Switzerland and Piedmont. Previous to its annexation to France, Savoy was divided into the two dioceses of Chambéry and Annecy the former comprising the provinces of Savoy Proper, Upper Savoy, Maurienne, and Tarentaise, and the latter the provinces of Genevois, Faucigny and Chablais. It now forms two departments, Savoie and HAUTE-SAVOIE. Area, about 4000 sq. m. Savoy is situated in the region of the western Alps, its surface being entirely covered by the mountains. The summit of Mont Blanc, the culminating point of the Alps is just within its borders. Savoy belongs to the basin of the Rhone, whose affluents the Arve and the Isère, flow respectively through the northern and the southern part. There are two lakes of considerable size, Bourget and Annecy. Among the mineral springs are those of Aix-les-Bains, St. Julien, and Evian. The products include cereals, wine, fruit, silk, tobacco, and cheese. The Savoyards are essentially French. Chambéry is the capital of the department of Savoie and Annecy of that of Haute-Savoie. Pop. in 1901 618,584.

The history of the house of Savoy which in the line of Savoy-Carignan is the reigning dynasty in Italy goes back to the early part of the eleventh century. From that time there were counts of Savoy whose dominions were included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The possessions of the house of Savoy were soon extended so as to comprise parts of Piedmont and Switzerland. By the close of the Middle Ages a great part of Piedmont was under its sway. In 1416 the county of Savoy was erected into a duchy. By this time the state was practically independent of the empire. In Switzerland the rulers of Savoy did not succeed in permanently maintaining their hold. In 1561 the marquisate of Saluzzo was annexed to Savoy. Part of the marquisate of Montferrat was acquired in 1631 and the remainder followed in 1704. In 1730 the duke of Savoy, having obtained the island of Sardinia in exchange for Sicily (ceded by Spain to Savoy in 1713) assumed the title of king of Sardinia. In 1860 Savoy was transferred to France.

Area, 810 sq. m. The western half belongs to the region of the Thuringian Forest and is watered by the Saale and its affluent, the Orla. The eastern half is watered by the river Pleisse. The chief industries are agriculture, forestry and cattle-rearing. Capital, Altenburg. Pop. in 1890 178,844. In 1900 194,614. The inhabitants are mainly Protestants. Saxe-Altenburg has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 1 member in the Reichstag.

Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, sax ko-burg-go-tha (Ger. Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha sax en ko-burg-go-tha) a duchy of Germany in Thuringia, composed of the duchies of Coburg and Gotha. Coburg is enclosed by the territories of Bavaria and Saxe-Meiningen. Gotha borders on Prussian Saxony, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Meiningen, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau and Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen. Area, 785 sq. m. The country is a picturesque region of mountains and fertile valleys, belonging to the Thuringian Forest, whose highest peaks (over 3000 feet) are in the duchy of Gotha. The inhabitants belong to the main to the agricultural class, but there are extensive and diversified manufactures. Capital, Coburg and Gotha. Pop. in 1890 206,613. In 1900 229,530. The great bulk of the people are Protestants. Saxe-Coburg-Gotha has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 2 members in the Reichstag.

Saxe-Meiningen, sax mi-nin-gen (Ger. Sachsen-Meiningen sax en mi-nin-gen) a duchy of Germany in Thuringia, consisting mainly of a long and narrow zone of a crescent shape, the convexity turned northward bounded by Saxe-Weimar, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, Bavaria, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and some of the lesser Thuringian states. Area, 953 sq. m. It is a hilly and mountainous region, traversed by the ranges of the Thuringian Forest, whose peaks rise to a height of about 2500 feet. Forests cover about two-fifths of the surface. The area of good agricultural land is limited. The manufactures are extensive, embracing glass, china, textiles, iron- and wooden-ware, toys, leather, beer, etc. The greater part of the surface is drained by the river Werra (one of the head-streams of the Elbe) and by the Saale an affluent of the Elbe. There are several small lakes. The great majority of the inhabitants are Lutherans. Capital, Meiningen. Other considerable towns are Hildburghausen, Sonneberg, Nailfeld, and Pörschke. Pop. in 1890 223,832. In 1900 250,751. Saxe-Meiningen has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 3 members in the Reichstag.

The middle portion that contains the towns of Weimar, Jena, and Apolda, is bounded mainly by Prussian Saxony, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, and Saxe-Altenburg. The eastern main division, that containing the town of Neunstadt, is separated from the middle one by Saxe-Altenburg and extends eastward as far as the borders of the kingdom of Saxony. The western main division that contains the town of Eisenach is bounded by Prussian Saxony, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, Bavaria, Saxe-Meiningen, and Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. Area of the grand-duchy 1388 sq. m. The surface is hilly and mountainous, the region embracing parts of the Thuringian Forest of the Rhinogebirge, and of the highlands of the Vogtland (on the borders of Saxony). There are some peaks exceeding 2500 feet in elevation. Saxe-Weimar almost wholly belongs to the basin of the Elbe and the Werra being drained by the Saale an affluent of the former and by the Werra, one of the head-streams of the latter. The division containing Weimar is best adapted to agriculture. The region of Eisenach contains extensive forests. The various cereals are extensively grown and the cultivation of fruit is of some importance. The manufacturing industries are well developed, the textile industry (including the manufacture of hosiery) being in the lead. There are manufactures of glass, china, toys, superior optical instruments, etc. Jena is the seat of a famous university. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Protestants. Capital, Weimar. Pop. in 1890 326,091. In 1900 362,873. Saxe-Weimar has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 3 members in the Reichstag.

Saxony (Ger. Sachsen, sax en), Kingdom of, a state of the German Empire, the fifth in size and the third in order of population, bounded on the N and NE by Prussia (provinces of Saxony and Silesia) on the SE by Bohemia, on the SW (for a short distance) by Bavaria, and on the W by Rhine, Saxe-Weimar Saxe-Altenburg and Prussian Saxony. Length, 144 miles, breadth 15 to 88 miles. Area, 5787 sq m. Pop. in 1900 4,203,316.

All but about 5 per cent. of the inhabitants are Protestants. The Catholics number about 300,000 and the Jews about 13,000. The royal family belongs to the Catholic church. The non-German element in the population (in addition to the foreigners) is that of the Wends, a Slavic people who live in the extreme E of the kingdom, in a portion of old Lusatia, and who number about 50,000. The kingdom is divided into the circles of Dresden, Leipzig, Bautzen, Chemnitz and Zwickau. The chief towns are Dresden, Leipzig, Chemnitz, Plauen, Zwickau, Meissen, Zittau, Freiberg, Bautzen and Glauchau. The capital is Dresden.

A large part of Saxony is mountainous or hilly. On the SE along a great part of the frontier in the side of Bohemia, stretches the Erzgebirge (Ore Mountain) reaching to the Fichtelberg an elevation of nearly 4000 feet. N of this eastern end, on both sides of the river Elbe is the mountainous region called the Harz in Switzerland with its fantastically castellated peaks rising to a height of about 1800 ft above the sea. The northwestern corner of the kingdom the region about Leipzig, is an extensive plain. The river Elbe traverses Saxony from SE to NW. It is navigable throughout the whole of its course within the kingdom. The largest river after the Elbe is the Mulde, which flows N through the western part of the country and joins the Elbe beyond its borders. Saxony possesses a fertile soil which is in a high state of cultivation. A large area is devoted to rye, oats, and potatoes, which are the leading crops. Fruit is extensively cultivated. The forests cover about one-fourth of the surface. Much attention is given to the rearing of live-stock. The sheep yield a fine quality of wool but sheep-breeding has declined greatly. Saxony is rich in minerals which include coal, silver, iron, lead, tin, arsenic, copper, cobalt, blende, and antimony besides a variety of precious and semi-precious stones, marble, sandstone (largely quarried) pterocladin-clay etc. The great mining centre is Freiberg. There are numerous mineral springs, the best known being those at Flöha. Saxony is more actively engaged in manufactures than any section of Germany except Westphalia and Rhineland Prussia. The textile industry takes the lead, a vast number of persons being employed in the weaving of linen, cotton and woolen fabrics and in the manufacture of knitted goods, embroidery lace, and passementerie. The manufacture of articles of apparel andinery is carried on very extensively. There are great establishments engaged in turning out machinery of all kinds. Food products are manufactured on a large scale. The so-called Dresden china, manufactured at Meissen is famous. Paper-making, brewing, wood working, the preparation of chemicals, distilling, the manufacture of articles of leather and piano-making are important industries. Leipzig vies with Berlin as the greatest publishing centre of Germany and is the foremost place in the world in the extent of its book trade. The iron industry is on a large scale. Saxony possesses one of the leading universities of Germany that of Leipzig. The mining academy of Freiberg is the most celebrated institution of its kind in the world. Dresden has a notable polytechnic institute and the conservatory of music at Leipzig is world-renowned. The government of Saxony is a constitutional monarchy. There are six ministerial departments,—justice, finance, interior, education and ecclesiastical affairs, foreign affairs, war. The legislature consists of two chambers. The first chamber is composed of princes, nobles, ecclesiastical burgomasters of the principal cities, deputies representing nobiliary estates, a few members nominated by the king, and a representative from the university of Leipzig. The second chamber or house of representatives is elected by indirect suffrage. The voters are divided into 3 classes: the representation being unequal. Saxony has 4 votes in the Bundesrat and sends 23 representatives to the Reichstag.

History.—In addition to the kingdom so-called, the name Saxony is a designation of one of the provinces of Prussia, and is borne also by four of the Thuringian states (Sachsen in the case of these being contracted in English to Saxe). It designates a very different region from the Saxony of the early period of German history. The home of the ancient Saxons was a territory extending southward from the river Elbe, near its mouth nearly to the Rhine, in the vicinity of Cologne. It was from this region that the Saxons came who with the Jutes and Angles, conquered Britain. Towards the close of the eighth century Charles the Great subdued the Saxons of the main land and forced them to accept Christianity. Soon after the partition of the Frankish realm by the grandsons of Charles, about the middle of the ninth century, the national duchy of the Saxons makes its appearance—one of the great fiefs of the new German kingdom. In 910 Henry the Fowler duke of Saxony was elected king of Germany. His son Otto succeeded him on the royal throne, and his coronation by the Pope at Rome in 962 inaugurated the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation. This monarch conferred Saxony on Hermann Billung, whose house ruled till 1106. Shortly before the middle of the twelfth century the duchy came into the possession of the house of Guelph (Weif). Henry the Lion of this house, who was also duke of Bavaria, was a feared vassal of Frederick Barbarossa. In 1181 the emperor brought about the fall of Henry, whose dominions were partitioned. The title of Duke of Saxony was now borne by Bernhard of Anhalt, a petty prince who had some possessions in the region of the Elbe. The lands of his house were divided about the middle of the thirteenth century and there were two illud duchies of Saxony Saxe-Lauenburg and Saxe-Wittenberg. In the Golden Bull of the emperor Charles IV issued in 1356 the duke of Saxe-Wittenberg was recognized as one of the imperial electors. In 1422 the line of Saxe-Wittenberg became extinct and the duchy and electoral dignity passed in 1433 to the earlgrave of Meissen (Mimma) of the House of Wettin. This house in addition to the Saxon and Misnian dominions, acquired possessions in Thuringia. Its dominions collectively became known as Saxony. In 1485 they were divided into two states—Saxony of the Ernestine Line (or electoral Saxony) and Saxony of the Albertine Line (or ducal Saxony) the capitals being respectively Wittenberg and Dresden. Wittenberg was the cradle of the Reformation.

In 1547 the elector of Saxony the main head of the Protestants in the war of the Schmalkalde League was deprived of his dominions and electoral dignity which were conferred upon Maurice of the ducal line. The Thuringian possessions were, however, restored to the Ernestine house, and out of these arose the small Saxon duchies. In 1635 Saxony acquired Lusatia. Two electors of Saxony in succession occupied the royal throne of Poland between 1697 and 1763. In 1694 Saxony was elevated to the rank of a kingdom. The king of Saxony was head of the duchy of Weismar from 1697-173. In 1815 Saxony in consequence of its alliance with Napoleon was deprived by the powers of half of its dominions, which were transferred to Prussia. From 1806-70 the kingdom was part of the North German Confederation, and in 1871 it became part of the new German Empire.

Saxony, a province of Prussia having on the NE. and E. the province of Brandenburg on the W. Brunswick and the provinces of Hanover and Hesse-Nassau and on the S. the Thuringian states and the kingdom of Saxony. Enclosed within it are the duchy of Anhalt and portions of Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, Brunswick, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, and Saxe-Weimar and there are detached fragments of the province enclosed within the Thuringian states. Area, 9,512 sq m. In the extreme W are the Harz mountains, while the southern portion belongs to the Thuringian high lands. The bulk of the province forms part of the great North German lowland. Prussian Saxony is watered by the Elbe with its tributaries the Black Elster, Mulde, and the Saale (which receives the Elstrut). This province is on the whole the most fertile portion of Prussia, producing bountiful crops of grain, potatoes and beets (for sugar). Vegetable farming and horticulture are extensively carried on and wine, hops and cherries are produced. Prussian Saxony has the most productive coal fields in Germany and rich deposits of common salt and other salts. Vast quantities of kumito are obtained at Stassfurt. The province is divided into the three districts of Magdeburg, Erfurt and Merseburg. Capital, Magdeburg. Pop. in 1900 2,833,010.

Schleswig-Holstein (bo'el'stin) a province of Prussia, formed out of the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein and Lauenburg formerly belonging to Denmark. It is co-extensive with the government-district of Schleswig and is bounded on the N by Denmark, on the E. by the Baltic Sea, Mecklenburg and Lübeck, on the S. and SW by the province of Hanover, from which it is separated by the river Elbe and Hamburg, and on the W by the North Sea. It includes the North Frisian Islands, in the North Sea, and the islands of Alsen and Fohrman, in the Baltic. Area, 7836 sq m. The northern half is Schleswig the southern, Holstein and Lauenburg, the latter a small district. The E. coast is deeply indented by fjord-like bays. Schleswig-Holstein is in the main a level region. There is a hilly tract in the E. while the W coast is extremely low so that it has to be protected by dikes against the sea. The chief river is the Eider flowing into the North Sea, formerly the boundary between Schleswig and Holstein. There are a number of lakes, the largest being Pils Lake. The soil is fertile in the E. and W. but the middle portion is unproductive moorland. Large crops of cereals and potatoes are raised. In no part of Prussia is the industry of cattle-breeding in such an advanced state as here. Horses are extensively reared. The forests cover but a small area. The manufacturing industries occupy a very subordinate position. The province is traversed by the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, connecting the Baltic and North seas. The leading institution of learning is the university of Kiel. Pop. in 1900 (inclusive of Helgoland), 1,387,905, nearly all Protestants. About one-tenth of the inhabitants are Danes. Capital, Schleswig.

Schleswig after having been an object of contention between the Germans and Danes, passed into the possession of the kings of Denmark in the eleventh century. It was treated as a separate country, being for a long period ruled by Danish governors or princes (dukes of Schleswig) belonging to the Danish dynasty and ultimately becoming an independent state under Danish overlordship. Towards the close of the fourteenth century Schleswig was united with the county of Holstein, which was included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The duchy of Schleswig continued to be a fief of Denmark. From 1460 the kings of Denmark were rulers of Schleswig-Holstein. In 1474 Holstein was erected from a county into a duchy. The dukes attempted ineffectually to liberate themselves from Denmark with the aid of the German states in 1545-50 (first Schleswig-Holstein War). In 1864 Prussia and Austria (in the second Schleswig-Holstein War) wrested the duchies from Denmark which also had to relinquish Lauenburg. The victory over Austria in 1866 enabled Prussia to incorporate these regions into her dominions. Lauenburg was not constituted part of the province of Schleswig-Holstein until 1875. It is bounded on the N and W by the Atlantic Ocean and on the E by the North Sea, and is in part separated from England by Solway Firth, an arm of the Irish Sea, and by the river Tweed, which flows into the North Sea. The Cheviot Hills extend along a portion of the boundary. The greatest length from NNE. to SSW between Dunnet Head and the Malt of Galloway is 287 miles. The breadth varies from about 150 miles to 40 miles. The distance between Leith, the port of Edinburgh, on the Firth of Forth, which indents the E. coast, and Greenock, on the Firth of Clyde, on the W coast, is about 60 miles. Numerous islands line the coasts and form one of their peculiar features. On the E. coast these islands are few and small; but on the N. are the two large groups of the Orkneys and Shetlands, while on the W a series of groups (the Hebrides or Western Isles) stretch almost uninterruptedly from N to S at a short distance from the coast, forming an insignificant portion of the whole area of the country. The largest of them are Lewis, North Uist, South Uist, Skye, Mull, Jura, and Islay. In the SW the islands of Arran and Bute, in the Firth of Clyde, form a separate county under the name of the latter. The coastline of Scotland is very largely developed as the result of a great number of seismic waves, estuaries, or fjords projecting into the land, of which the narrower ones are usually termed lochs and the broader and more extensive ones firths. Those on the W coast are the Firth of Clyde; Loch Long, between Argyllshire and Dumfriesshire; Loch Fyne and Linnhe, in Argyllshire; Loch Eil, in Inverness; Loch Carron, Torridon, and Broom, in Ross and Cromarty; and Ayr, in Southwold. On the E coast are the large indentations known as Moray Firth, Firth of Tay and the Firth of Forth.

Loch Ness, in Inverness, a virtually enclosed narrow arm of the sea, occupies part of the deep depression known as the Great Glen or Glen More (see Alba) and communicates by means of the Ness River in the NE with Moray Firth, and by means of the Caledonian Canal and other waters with Loch Lomond and the more distant Firth of Lorne. This famous canal, which then unites the waters of the North Sea with those of the Atlantic, and is chiefly a tourist resort, occupies what seems to be an ancient fracture or a subglacial trough. The Atlantic and North Sea waters are also united by the Forth and Clyde Canal. Other minor canals connect a number of the interior lochs with the sea, as the Crinan Canal, between Loch Fyne and Jura Sound. There are numerous headlands and promontories on the coast, the chief of which are St. Abb's Head, in Berwickshire; Fife Ness, the termination of the peninsula of Fife;

Blackon Ness, in Forfarshire; Griffin Ness, at the mouth of the Dee, in Kincardineshire; Buchan Ness and Peterhead Point, in Aberdeenshire, the most easterly land in Scotland. Kinnaird Head, also in Aberdeenshire, Tachet Ness, in Ross and Cromarty, on the N side of the entrance to Moray Firth. Noss Head, Dunmurry Head, and Dunnet Head, in Caithness; Strathely Point, Witten Head, Cape Wrath, and Rhian Stoir in Sutherland; the Mull of Kintyre, the extremity of the long peninsula of Kintyre, in Argyll; Caniswell Point, at the NW extremity of the Rhinns of Galloway in Wigtownshire; and Mull Head and the Mull of Galloway also in Wigtown. The chief rivers of Scotland are the Tweed, Forth, Tay, North and South Bek, Dee, Don, Deveron, Spey, Lochie, Findhorn, Ness, Benuly, Carron, Gyph, Brora, Kilmaleid, and Wick on the eastern side, and the Avon, Nith, Don, Cree, Ayr, Doon, and Clyde, on the S and W. Of the large number of interior lakes, known as lochs, many of which are noted for their beautiful scenery may be mentioned Loch Lomond, on the borders of Dumfriesshire and the county of Stirling; the closely neighboring Loch Katrine; Loch Tay, Briarton, Rannoch, and Karn, in Perthshire; Loch Awe, in Argyllshire; Loch Ness already referred to as occupying the deep depression of the Caledonian Canal; and Loch Lomond in Kilmory. Loch Morar in the western part of Inverness, separated by only a short space from the ocean is the deepest lake in the British Isles its depth being 1278 feet.

Relief of the Land.—In its vertical relief Scotland can readily be divided into three broad sections, which are sharply defined by NE and SW tectonic lines, or lines produced by geological structure (faulting). (1) The largest division is that of the Highlands in the N, occupying more than one-half of the area of the country and consisting of a fairly lofty upland of nearly horizontally disposed strata. The summits rise to a generally uniform level while the valleys show deep eroded action, continued into Tertiary and Post-Tertiary times. It is in this region that the grandeur of Scottish scenery is developed,—the rugged and precipitous mountain-walls, the deep and secluded valleys partially overgrown with heather and gorse and the long lines of islands that project from the oceanic borders into the land. The Highlands, which remain to this day a wild and largely inaccessible region abounding in a fair amount of game, have an average elevation of about 1500 feet, but individual summits rise to nearly three times this height. Ben Nevis, in the SW part of Inverness, and close to the depression of the Great Glen is the culminating point of the British Isles, 4406 ft. Somewhat less lofty is Ben Moidul, on the borders of Aberdeenshire and Banff 4395 ft. Other prominent summits are Oslergorum 4064 ft. Ben Lawers, 3985 ft. Ben More, 3843 ft. Ben y Glie, 3778 ft. and Ben Wyvis, 3429 ft. In this section of Scotland, one situated largely of ancient Archean rocks and to which all the western islands (Hebrides etc.) belong volcanic outflows have had an important share in shaping the physiognomy of the land-surface, and have supplied vast lavas, sheets, columnar basalts (as in Fingal's Gorge, in the island of Staffa), and the remains or wrecks of hundreds of volcanic cones (Skye, Mull etc.). (2) The second natural division is that of the sub-central Lowlands, which lie immediately S of the Highlands, whose border range is designated the Grampian Mountains,—a subdued block of the earth's crust, with the surface resting on Carboniferous or Devonian strata, and into which enter some of the larger rivers or fjords (Clyde) and which contains many of the finest lakes (Lomond, Katrine, Lorn, Tay, etc.) The general elevation of this region is under 500 ft. dropping in the lowest divide between the North Sea and the Atlantic Ocean to 200 ft. Among the subordinate ranges of heights are the Slidaw and Ochil hills, in Perthshire and Forfarshire, the Pentlands hills, SW of Edinburgh, and the Lothian hills, mainly in Haddington. This section has a soil of great fertility and rich deposits of coal and iron, and here are most of the great centres of population, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, Leith, Paisley, etc. (3) The third division is that of the Southern Uplands, rising in their highest point, Mount Merrick, to 2700 ft. and continued to the frontier of England. This is largely a sheep-raising region.

Climate.—The climate in the W and S. parts is mild but humid in the central elevated regions, chilly and humid. In the eastern plains and Lowlands, more genial although these sections are exposed in spring to chilly easterly winds. In the Lowlands the summer is not so warm as that of England, but the winter is, on the whole, milder and the climate is salubrious. Meteorological observations made over most parts of the main-land and islands indicate that the mean temperature for January is 38° and for July 57°. Mean annual temperature of the main land, 48°; of the Shetland Islands, about 44°. In general, much more rain falls on the W coast than on the E., the range being from about 30 inches on the western rim of the Highlands to 30 and 35 inches on the E. coast. On the southern uplands the precipitation is about 60 inches. Prevailing winds, W and SW in spring, N and NE. Only about 5 per cent. of the area of Scotland is covered with forests, largely of pine. Except in the greater preponderance of Alpine plants, the flora of Scotland resembles very much that of England. Most of the animals are likewise those of England. A conspicuous furred type of the Highlands is the red deer. Agriculture, Fisheries, Minerals.—Only about one-fourth of the area of Scotland is under cultivation a great part of the country being rendered unfit for agriculture on account of its rugged character. The principal cereals are oats and barley. The area under wheat is small. Potatoes, turnips and beans are extensively cultivated. Sheep-raising is an important branch of rural economy. The fisheries are a great source of wealth to the Scottish people. Herring, haddock and other fish abound in the seas, and salmon are caught in the rivers. The value of the fish (exclusive of shell-fish) landed on the coasts of Scotland in 1903 was £3,401,232. Dundee is the principal seat of the whale and seal-fishing in Great Britain. The leading mineral products of Scotland are coal, iron, and oil-shales. The total value of the mineral products in 1902 was £12,424,000. The great bulk of this amount represented the value of the coal, of which 24,000,000 tons were mined, about one-half of which came from the Lanarkshire district.

Manufactures.—Scotland has risen in recent times to the position of one of the important manufacturing countries of Europe. The textile and iron- and steel-industries are represented on a vast scale. Glasgow is a great seat of the manufacture of cotton, Dundee, of that of linen and jute. Paisley of cotton-thread. Various textile manufactures are carried on in Aberdeenshire and Kilmarnock. The Clyde is the principal seat of the ship-building industry in the world. There are great iron-works and machine-shops in Glasgow, Coatbridge, Dundee, Aberdeenshire, and Motherwell, in addition to the ship-building towns of Greenock, Partick, and Govan. The manufacture of chemicals is carried on on an extensive scale at Glasgow and elsewhere. There are numerous distilleries (Scottish whiskey) and breweries in Glasgow, Edinburgh and Aberdeen. Edinburgh is one of the leading publishing centres of the Anglo-Saxon world. Among other industries are sugar-refining and the manufacture of paper, gloves, hosiery, carpets, shawls, and glass. At the beginning of 1903 there were 5500 miles of railway in Scotland. The principal seaports are Glasgow, Leith (the port of Edinburgh), Dundee, Aberdeen, and Greenock.

Population, Representation in Parliament, Religion, etc.—The population of Scotland in 1861 was 2,898,742; in 1881, 2,755,537; in 1891, 2,635,647; in 1901, 4,472,103. The country is divided into 33 counties, which with their population in 1901 are as follows:

County.	Pop. in 1901.	County.	Pop. in 1901.
Aberdeen	204,430	Kirkcubright	30,332

Since 1707 Scotland and England have been united for legislative purposes under the name of Great Britain. Scotland is represented in the British House of Commons by 73 members,—39 from the counties, 31 from the boroughs, and 3 from the universities. In the British House of Lords it is represented by 16 peers, elected for the duration of parliament by the Scottish peers. There is a Local Government Board for Scotland, presided over by the Secretary for Scotland, who is a member of the cabinet. The capital is Edinburgh. Scotland still retains its ancient system of jurisprudence based upon the Roman or civil law. The Gaelic tongue is spoken by between 200,000 and 250,000 persons, but of these only about one-fifth speak Gaelic alone to the exclusion of English. About seven-eighths of the people of Scotland belong to the Presbyterian church. The clergy are all on the same level, the parishioners choosing their ministers. The Presbyterians are about equally divided between the adherents of the Church of Scotland (the established church, which has relations with the civil power) and those of the United Free Church of Scotland which was organized in 1900 by the secession from the established church in 1843) and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. The supreme court in each of these churches is the General Assembly. About one-tenth of the inhabitants (mainly Irish or of Irish descent) are Roman Catholics. Scotland possesses 4 universities,—those of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Saint Andrews.

History.—The part of Britain N. of the firths of Forth and Clyde, comprising the bulk of modern Scotland was called by the ancients Caledonia. This portion of the island was not subdued by the Romans. In a 80-81 Agricola advanced the Roman frontiers as far as the firths of Forth and Clyde. At the time when Rome began to be pressed by the Germanic invaders the people called Picts (who in spite of their Celtic speech are held by some not to have been of Celtic blood) pulled forth from their mountain fastnesses in Caledonia and harassed Britain. The Picts were joined by the Scots from Ireland. When the Roman legions were withdrawn these invaders overran the country of the Britons. About the close of the fifth century the Scots founded the realm of Dalriada in the W. part of the country N. of the Clyde. The Picts and Scots were finally checked by the Angles who pressed forward into the Lowlands of Scotland. The SE corner of the country formed part of the realm of Mercia, which towards the close of the ninth century was united with its neighbor to the N. Dairia into the kingdom of Northumbria. The Picts were pressed back beyond the Forth. In the SW corner of the country in Cumbria (which embraced also the NW corner of England) the Cymry in habitant held their ground. In the second half of the ninth century Columba, a pious Christian among the Picts, the Scots had already received the Gospel. About 843 Kenneth MacAlpin king of the Scots united the Pictish kingdom with his own. His realm was known as the kingdom of Alba. The Pictish and Scottish nationalities were gradually fused. By the beginning of the eleventh century through the acquisition of Cumbria, Lothian and other territories the whole of what is now the main-land of Scotland had come under the rule of the Scottish king. It was not until then that the name Scotland came to be recognized as a designation in pure and simple of the country of the Scots, it has long been a genuine home by the Irish. The Orkney and Shetland islands and part of the Hebrides were long in the possession of the Scandinavians. In the period following the Norman conquest of England large numbers of Anglo-Normans settled in Scotland which was gradually transformed into a land much more Teutonic than Celtic. King David I (1124-53) effected much in the way of introducing English civilization into the country which enjoyed a long period of prosperity brought to a close by the contention regarding the succession to the crown at the end of the thirteenth century and the wars that followed. Edward I of England took advantage of the internal divisions to assert his sway over Scotland which for a brief time was under English domination until the victory of Robert Bruce at Bannockburn (1314) secured the liberation of the country. The Stuart dynasty was inaugurated in 1371. The Reformation was established by parliament in 1560 and in 1592 Presbyterianism was declared by parliament to be the religion of the kingdom. In 1603 the crown of Scotland and England were united by the accession of James VI (I) to the English throne on the death of Elizabeth. In 1707 the legislative union of the two countries took place Scotland giving up its parliament. There were rebellions in favor of the Stuarts in 1715 and 1745-46. The nineteenth century witnessed the transformation of a Scotland from a land of humble industrial activities but playing a great role in the intellectual life of the world, into a busy manufacturing country.

Sebastopol (Russ. Севастополь) is a city and a port of Russia on the Black Sea in the government of Taurida, situated near the S extremity of the Crimean, on a projection of land 37 miles SW of Simferopol. It stands on a narrow bay which forms one of the best harbors on the Russian coast. The entrance is strongly fortified and the town is further protected by chains of forts. Sebastopol has practically sprung up again since the ruin wrought by the Allies in 1855, and this transformation is reflected in its broad boulevards and modern edifices. The principal buildings are the Peter Paul cathedral modelled after the temple of Theseus at Athens, and the Vladimir cathedral with a richly decorated interior. The town has numerous monuments erected to the memory of the soldiers in the Crimean War and there is a cemetery containing the bodies of about 17,000 victims of the conflict. The town has some manufactures and a ship building establishment.

Sebastopol was founded by Catharina II in 1784, and about twenty years later Alexander I made it the principal naval station of Russia on the Black Sea. Under Nicholas I fortifications were constructed which were supposed to render the place impregnable. The siege of Sebastopol in the Crimean War belongs to the most memorable military events of modern times. In 1854 the English and French undertook an expedition for the reduction of the fortress. They were aided by the Serbians and Turks. The investment of the place began in October of that year. The defense was conducted with the greatest skill by Todleben and the fortress held out until Sept. 8, 1855 when the efforts of the besiegers were crowned with success. Pop. in 1897 44,016.

Senegal, sēn' gawī (Fr Sénégal sē'nā gāī) a river of French western equatorial Africa, rises, under the name of Bading (black river), in about lat. 16° 30' N lon 16° 40' W near Timbo (Tombu), where its source is separated from those of the Niger by the highlands of the Mandingo country. Its general course is NW and W through the Senegambia and Niger Territories and the colony of Senegal—its basin lying N of that of the Gambia, and it enters a lagoon of the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 16° N lon 16° 33' W near the town of Saint-Louis. Total course estimated at 1000 miles. Its chief affluents are the Fouta a large and navigable stream on the W and the Bakhoi (a white river) on the E the latter whose confluence is at Bafoulé being sometimes considered to be one of the forks of the Senegal. The navigation of the Senegal in its upper course is frequently interrupted by vertical falls and cataracts. In the lowlands it is a sluggish stream whose waters are at times greatly swollen by the rains, and it frequently divides so as to enclose islands. Vessels of moderate draught ascend the river at all seasons from its mouth to the cataract of Fala SE of Kayes (up to which point there is regular steamboat navigation) and larger vessels reach the same point at times of flood-water. The Senegal is the 6th largest permanent river of western Africa S. of Morocco.

Senegal (Fr Sénégal) a French colonial dependency of western Africa, consisting since the decrees of 1902 and 1904, which took from the old colony much of its area and created the Senegambia and Niger Territories, chiefly of the Atlantic coast-strip between lat. 16° N (the limit being sometimes extended to Cape Blanco) and Portuguese Guinea,—excluding therefrom British Guinea,—and the land immediately adjoining the Senegal on both banks below the junction with the Fouta. It thus includes the districts and surroundings of Saint-Louis, Dakar (the chief port of the colony and the administrative seat of the French colonies of west-central Africa) Gorée, Rufisque, Dagana, Richard Toll, Bakel, etc., and a tract on the lower Casamansa. The region is mostly low in part infertile, but luxuriantly forested in some sections of the Senegal valley. The climate is subject to a high summer temperature and on the whole is unhealthy especially so in the coast-strip and near the embouchure of the Senegal. Ground-nuts, millet, maize, coconuts, resins, and rubber are among the native products, there are few industries beyond native weaving, the fashioning of gold ornaments, and pottery and brick-making. The exports are chiefly ground-nuts. A railway 188 miles in length unites Dakar, Rufisque, and Saint-Louis. Capital Saint-Louis. The colony is represented by a single member in the Chamber of Deputies of France.

Senegambia, sén-a-gam'-bē (Fr. Sénégalie, sā nā gān bē') a name formerly applied to a vast region of western Africa, comprising broadly the lands under French domination between about lat. 8° and 18° N and having the Sahara on the N the Sudan on the E (with no clearly established boundary) the countries of the Guianas east on the E. and the Atlantic coast on the W. The region thus corresponded virtually to what was until recently Senegal. The major portion of it is to-day part of the newly constituted Senegambia and Niger Territories. See Senegal and Senegambia and Niger Territories.

Senegambian and Niger Territories, a territorial dependency of France, in western equatorial Africa, founded by decrees of 1902 and 1904. They are a geographical hinterland of the colony of Senegal consisting in major part of that portion of old Senegambia which is not to-day included in Senegal—i.e. the interior country excepting a strip on either side of the Senegal River below the Fatick. The Territories are virtually the territories of the Upper Senegal and of the Middle Niger and the Military District. The whole is united under one administrative régime.

Servia, sêr-vî-â (Slavic Srbija ser bee'yâ), a kingdom of Europe, bounded on the N. by the rivers Bore and Danube, separating it from the kingdom of Hungary (Slavonia and Hungary proper) on the E. by the Danube, separating it from Rumania and (for the greater part of the distance) Bulgaria, on the SW by Turkey and on the W by Bosnia, from which it is separated in great part by the river Drina. The country lies between the parallels of 45° 29' and 48° N. lat. Area, 15,630 sq. m. The surface, which has a general slope towards the N. is very mountainous. On the eastern frontier the mountains which form the connecting link between the Carpathians and Balkans rise to an elevation of over 7000 feet above the sea. A southern border-range reaches to about an equal elevation. In the section bordering on Bosnia are mountains about 4000 ft. high. Many deep valleys stretch between the mountain-ranges, through which flow considerable rivers. The principal stream is the Morava, which drains the southern and central parts of the country into the Danube. The climate of Servia is somewhat rigorous in the more mountainous parts and very mild in the valleys and plains. The average annual precipitation is about 25 inches. The soil of Servia is in general very productive. In spite of the primitive methods of cultivation bountiful crops of cereals are produced, wheat and Indian corn being the principal grains. The country is a fine fruit region. The plum-orchards are a prominent feature; their enormous product being in great part converted into plum brandy (slivovitz). Much wine is made, and tobacco and hemp are extensively cultivated. Stock raising is almost as important as agriculture. There are great numbers of horned cattle, sheep, swine, and goats. The pastures are excellent and the forests which clothe the mountain-slopes afford rich nutriment to swine. Silk-worms are extensively reared. The bulk of the agricultural land consists of small holdings, cultivated by peasant proprietors. The Serbs are almost wholly an agricultural and pastoral people. They display however great mechanical ability and while modern methods of manufacture are but little employed, the products of home industry—textiles and all kinds of metallic and wooden wares—bear witness to much industrial activity. The mineral products of Servia are diversified, but as yet the total yield is not large. Coal, copper, lead, and antimony are worked and gold and silver are obtained in small quantities. The furze-fishery is carried on in the Danube and the mountain streams furnish trout. The annual value of the exports of the products of Servia has averaged during the last few years about $14,000,000. The value of the imports is about two-thirds of that of the exports. The foreign trade is mainly with Austria-Hungary, Germany and Great Britain. The exports include live cattle and hogs, slaughtered hogs, sheepskins or hides, wool, tallow, agricultural produce, fruits, staves, etc.

The government of Servia is a constitutional monarchy, the ministers being responsible to the nation. The legislative power is vested in the Skupstina (or national assembly) elected by universal suffrage (with a limitation of a tax-qualification). There is a Council of State, one-half of whose members are appointed by the king and one-half by the Skupstina. The capital of the kingdom is Belgrade. The state religion is the Orthodox Greek church. The archbishop of Belgrade is the primate of the Servian church to which nearly all the inhabitants of the country belong. The population of Servia at the close of 1900 was 2,463,770. Nearly nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Serbs. There are over 150,000 Rumanians and about 45,000 Gypsies. The Jews number only about 5000. The Serbs are a Slavic people, constituting essentially one nationality with the Croats of Austria-Hungary. In their writing they employ the Cyrillic alphabet, while the Croats use the Roman characters. There is an extensive Servian literature. The great mass of the inhabitants of Servia are illiterate. Only a very minute fraction of the inhabitants are sunk in poverty.

Under the Romans Servia was included in the province of Moesia Superior. The Serbs settled in the region in the seventh century. From the eleventh century there was an independent kingdom of Servia, which reached the height of its power under Stephen Drasko about the middle of the fourteenth century when it embraced a large part of the Balkan Peninsula. The power of the Serbs was broken by the Turks in the battle of Kosovo in 1389, and in 1459 their realm was incorporated in the Turkish Empire. The little state of Montenegro was an offshoot of the Servian kingdom. Belgrade, which had passed into the possession of Hungary, was taken by the Turks in 1521. Serbia was terribly oppressed by the Turks. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the country rose under Kara (Kara) George, but the sultan succeeded in re-establishing his authority. A fresh rising under Miloš Obrenović, initiated in 1815, secured the liberation of the country which, however, remained in the position of a vassal state of the Turkish Empire, the ruler bearing the title of prince. In 1867 the Turkish garrison in Belgrade was withdrawn. Serbia waged war with Turkey in 1876 and 1877-78. The Congress of Berlin in 1878 declared Serbia completely independent. In 1882 Milan Obrenović assumed the title of king. Serbia waged a disastrous war with Bulgaria in 1885. The present dynasty is that of Karađorđević.

Seville, se-vill (Sep. Sevilla, sh-veel yā and His-pa-lis), a city of Spain in Andalus capital of the province of Seville, on the left bank of the Guadalquivir about 60 miles NNE. of Cadix. Lat. 37° 23' N. lon. 6° 1' W. It is practically a seaport although over 50 miles distant from the ocean for the tidal Guadalquivir is navigable to this place at high water by large ships. The city lies in a highly cultivated region, has a delightful climate, and possesses great historic and architectural interest. Although portions have been modernized Seville wears in great part a characteristically Moorish aspect. The older quarters consist of a mass of tortuous streets and alleys, interspersed with fine squares. In the modern portions there are attractive boulevards. A large part of the dwellings are two-story houses, almost invariably white, enclosing beautiful patios (or courts) adorned with fountains and flowers. The city is embowered in brilliant southern vegetation. Of the great wall which until recently encircled the city only a few of the gateways remain. The principal public places are the shady Alameda de Hércules, adorned with many statues, the Plaza de San Fernando and the Plaza de Triunfo flanked by the cathedral, the alcazar and the Casa Lonja (or exchange). Among the most attractive boulevards are the Paseo de Cristinas and the Paseo de las Delicias. The cathedral of Seville is second in size only to St. Peter's in Rome, and is one of the most superb monuments of Gothic architecture. It has splendid stained glass windows and its chapels are rich repositories of works of art. This edifice, which was severely damaged by earthquake disturbances in 1807-1808, contains the ashes of Columbus, recently brought hither from Havana. The most striking, as it is the oldest, building of Seville is the Giralda, a square tower over 300 feet high, beautifully proportioned whose upper part consists of a sixteenth-century belfry and dome the whole surmounted by a colossal bronze statue of Faith, which serves as a weather vane. The alcazar, once the palace of the Moorish kings of Seville and afterwards of the Castilian kings, is one of the grandest buildings of the city. Among its most interesting features are a richly decorated facade and beautiful windows the exquisite Court of the Maidens, the Hall of Charles V. the so-called Dolls Court, and the chapel of the Catholic kings. It is surrounded by beautiful gardens. Other notable edifices are the superb Casa de Pilatos, in Renaissance style the palace of San Telmo the beautiful Casa de Ayuntamiento (town hall) the Aedificia (Court of Justice), the ancient Torre de Oro (Golden Tower) the Casa Lonja (exchange) with a splendid staircase, the churches of San Salvador San Isidro, San Pedro San Marcos, and San Lorenzo several old convents and the great government tobacco-factory covering 6 acres. The Provincial Museum contains the largest collection of the works of Murillo who, as well as Velasquez was a native of Seville. At the head of the educational institutions of Seville is the university founded at the beginning of the sixteenth century and attended by about 1400 students. The provincial library contains 86,000 volumes. The city possesses a provincial school of art, the Columbian Library founded by Fernando Colón son of Columbus, and containing numerous manuscripts of the discoverer and a museum of archaeology. A rich collection of Indian archives is housed in the Casa Lonja. The Civil Hospital is one of the largest institutions of the kind in the world. Part of the water-supply of Seville is conveyed through a Roman aqueduct. The bull ring is next to that of Madrid the largest in Spain. In addition to tobacco, the manufactures comprise chocolate, soap, corks, silk, iron-castings, etc. There are celebrated potteries in the suburb of Triana. Seville has a large trade in the products of the region. The city has been the seat of an archbishop since the time of the Visigoths. It is the residence of the captain-general of Andalusia.

The city, under the name of Hispalia, was a place of great importance under the Romans. In the eleventh century there was a flourishing Moorish kingdom of Seville under the Abbadide dynasty one of the states which arose on the ruins of the caliphate of Cordova. St. Ferdinand of Castile achieved the conquest of the city in 1248 and added it to the Castilian dominions, of which it was long the capital. For a long time after the discovery of America Seville was the leading commercial emporium of Spain. It was finally supplanted by Cadix and sank into comparative insignificance. Pop. in 1900, 147,271.

Shanghai, shang ki a seaport of China, the chief emporium open to European commerce, in the province of Kiang su, 160 miles SSE. of Nanking. It is situated on the left bank of the Hwang pu (a tidal water-course) which joins the estuary of the Yang-tse-kiang where that broad channel opens into the sea (about 13 miles from the city) and which below Shanghai is called the Wu-sung-kiang, a name borne by a small stream which here joins the Hwang pu and is known to foreigners as Soo-chow Creek. Lat. 31° 12' N. lon. 121° 28' E. Shanghai stands on a level and highly cultivated plain, which is intersected by innumerable water-courses. The native town, which is enclosed by a wall, is very small only about 1 mile in diameter but immediately outside of it are populous suburbs.

It presents an uninviting appearance with its narrow and dirty streets. To the N and NE of it is the extensive foreign settlement, with a water front of over 3 miles. It comprises the British and French concessions and the American quarter. The portion along and near the water presents the aspect of a modern European city with its stately commercial and public edifices, its club-houses, theatres and newspaper offices, its tramways and electric-lighting and its wharves and large warehouses. There is a fine boulevard (or esplanade) along the shore. The foreign settlement is removed from the jurisdiction of the Chinese of so-called. The foreign population constitutes but a small fraction of its inhabitants. Opposite the British concession is the important commercial and industrial section called Pootung which has ship-building establishments and machine-shops on a large scale. Shanghai ranks among the foremost commercial emporiums of the E. The aggregate value of the imports from foreign countries (including Hong Kong) and exports to foreign countries has risen to over $200,000,000 annually the commerce increasing from year to year with rapid strides. About three-fourths of all the imports are from the British Isles and British colonies. Only about one-fourth of the exports go to them. The leading imports comprise cotton yarn and cotton stuffs, opium, metals, woolen goods, petroleum, glass, watches, lamps, colors, electrical apparatus, machinery, etc. The native exports comprise raw silk, silk fabrics, tea, cotton, rice, sugar, wool, paper, hides, beans and bean-oil, wheat, etc. There are whole fleets of junks engaged in the coasting trade. The city has a number of establishments connected with the textile industry. A large imperial arsenal is located here. Shanghai was formerly extremely unhealthy but a great improvement has taken place in the hygienic condition of the foreign section. The climate is characterized by sudden fluctuations of temperature. The population is estimated at about 600,000. About one-half of the inhabitants live within the boundaries of the foreign concessions. The foreign population in 1901 numbered 6774. It is increasing rapidly. Shanghai was opened to foreign commerce in 1842.

Shumla, shoom-lá (Turk Shumla or Shumna Bulg. Shumen) a town of Bulgaria situated amid the northern outliers of the eastern Balkans, 55 miles W of Varna. It occupies a site at the bottom of an amphitheatre formed by curving heights. Its position is strategically very important, as it is here that the routes from the Danube, proceeding from Sulistria and Rustchuk in the direction of Adrianople, 9nd pass over the Balkans, and meet the road from Varna. The town cannot easily be approached by a hostile army except on one side. Under the Turks it was a great stronghold, which repeatedly baffled the attacks of the Russians (1774, 1810 1828). It remained in the hands of the Turks throughout the war of 1877-78, but at its close it passed out of their possession. More than one-third of the inhabitants are Turks and the numerous mosques are the principal architectural features of the town. Shumla has an active trade and railway connections. The industries comprise weaving tanning the manufacture of metalware, etc. The town is the seat of a Greek metropolitan. Pop. in 1901 22 928.

Shumliu, a post-village of Chautauque co., N. Y. 4 miles SE of Laona.

Siam, si-am (Si-am Vang Phao — a land of the free) a kingdom of southeastern Asia, occupying most of the central part of the Indo-Chinese Peninsula. In addition to the main body of the country which extends from about lat. 17° to about 20° 30' N the dominions of Siam including the regions over which the king exercises merely a suzerainty comprise a long narrow strip reaching far down into the Malay Peninsula, nearly to the parallel of 4° N lat. known as Lower Siam. Area, situated at about 220,000 sq. m. more than one-fourth being in the Malay Peninsula. Siam proper is bounded on the N by the country of the Shans (in Burma and Laos, a division of French Indo-China) on the E by French Indo-China (Cochin China) on the S by the Gulf of Siam (an arm of the Chinese Sea) and on the W by Burma. Lower Siam borders on the British colony of the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States. There are a number of islands off the coasts of the Malay Peninsula, the largest being Tantalein in the China Sea, and Junkyeion in the Indian Ocean. The river Mekong forms a great part of the boundary between Siam and French Indo-China.

The principal feature of Siam proper is the broad valley of the Menam the lower part of which is a vast alluvial plain whose boundless fertility is maintained by the annual delutions of the river and the great network of irrigation canals. This river rises in the mountains in the extreme N and traverses the country in a southerly direction, emptying into the Gulf of Siam at its head. Its chief tributary is the Me-ping, from the W. The northern part of the country is a mountainous region and along the W border extends a range of mountains which attain a height of about 7000 feet. There is a mountainous belt to the E of the river Menam, at no great distance from it. The remainder of Siam proper is in general a level country (in part a plateau) with some mountains of small elevation. Among the rivers in addition to the Menam and its tributaries, are the Nam-mun and Nam-mi whose united waters, under the name of So-mun, flow into the Mekong. The Mekong, which enters the Gulf of Siam to the W of the Menam and the Salween which flows for some distance along the W boundary. On the borders of Siam and Cambodia is the large lake Tonlé-Sap (Siem-hoa) abounding in fish. Lower Siam is mostly a mountainous region.

A large part of Siam is covered with forest and jungle. The forests yield teak and other precious woods and various tropical products. Among the fruits of Siam is the delicious mangosteen. The chief agricultural crop is rice for whose cultivation the periodically inundated lowlands of the Menam are admirably adapted. This constitutes the staple food of the inhabitants. Pepper is an important product. Cotton, tobacco, sugar and coffee are grown. The mineral wealth of the country but little developed, includes gold, iron, copper, antimony, zinc, and rubies and sapphires, which are exported in considerable quantities, besides tin, which is mined in the Malay Peninsula. The forests and jungles abound in wild animals, including the elephant (the light-colored variety of which commonly spoken of as the white elephant, is held in superstitious veneration) rhinoceros, tiger, leopard, water buffalo, wild bear, deer and gibbon. Crocodiles are found. The climate presents a long wet season in the summer, when the southwest monsoon blow and a dry season. The difference between the mean temperatures of the hottest and coldest months in the lower Menam valley is only about 10°. The population of Siam is variously estimated at between 5,000,000 and 10,000,000. The Siamese, Chinese and Laotians (whose country Laos belongs partly to Siam and partly to French Indo-China) constitute the bulk of the inhabitants. The remainder consists mainly of Peguans, Burmese, Cambodians and Malays. The Siamese, as well as the Laotians, are Mongolians of the Thai stock. The Siamese language is an Indo-Chinese easily intelligible tongue. There is a large and steady influx of coolies from China the demand for their labor being great. The capital of the country is Bangkok, near the mouth of the Menam, with a population variously estimated at between 250,000 and 300,000. The former capital of the country Ayuthia, once a rich city is situated on the Menam about 50 miles above Bangkok. Buddhism is the prevailing religion of the country and the state church. Education is almost entirely in the hands of the Buddhist priests. The government maintains at Bangkok several English schools, or schools where English is taught. Slavery exists, but is being gradually abolished. The government of Siam is an absolute monarchy. The king is assisted by a regularly constituted ministry and there is a legislative council consisting of ministers of state, active or retired and a number of men nominated by the sovereign. A notable advance has recently been made in the administration of justice and in the system of police the government having availed itself of the co-operation of foreigners, especially Englishmen. In general a considerable improvement is manifest in local administration. There are about forty provinces administered by governors. More than one-half of the territory nominally subject to the king of Siam is included within the British and French spheres of influence. In the N are several Laotian states — Chiang mai, Nan, Lampang etc. — ruled by native princes under control of Siamese commissioners. Lower Siam is occupied by autonomous Malay states ruled by rajahs, likewise controlled by Siamese commissioners.

The bulk of the exports from Siam consists of rice the annual shipments of which amount in value to between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000. The next most important article of export is teak the cutting of which is mainly done by the English who have a monopoly over the forests. Trade and the manufacturing industries are mainly in the hands of the Chinese. Outside of the facilities afforded by the water ways, the means of communication throughout most of the country are extremely primitive. Recently Siam has embarked upon the construction of railways, of which there are now some hundreds of miles in operation. Telegraphs have been introduced. The capital is passing through a process of modernization evidenced in electric tramways and electric illumination.

Siam began to enter into relations with the Christian world in the seventeenth century. In the course of the nineteenth century regular diplomatic relations were established with the United States and European nations. In 1893 France forced Siam by threat of war to acknowledge the Mekong as the boundary of the French dependencies. By the treaty of 1904 France has come into possession of some Siamese territory on the W side of the Mekong.

Siam, Gulf of, between lat. 7° and 14° N and lon. 99° and 105° E. is bounded by the Malay Peninsula, Siam, Cambodia and Cochin China. Length 450 miles breadth at entrance, 240 miles. It receives the Menam and several other rivers.

Siam-se-i or Siao, or Siauw, se-sw, an island in the Malay Archipelago, between the NE. extremity of Celebes and Pangloss. Lat. 2° 40' N.

Siang-kiang, se-ang'ke-ang' or Heng-kiang, a river of China an affluent of the Yang-tse-kiang flowing N through the E part of the province of Ho-nan. Near its mouth its waters, together with those of the Yuen-kiang, form the extensive lake called Tung-ting-hu.

Siang-tan, se-ang tan a city of China, province of Hunan, on the Siang-kiang, about 80 miles SSW of Chang-sha. It is a great commercial centre.

Hsiang-yang, se-ang yang a city of China, province of Ku-poh, on the Han-hsiang, opposite Fan-ching. Lat. about 33° N, lon 112° E. Pop about 50,000.

Siangao, se-an-gu an island of the Philippines, off the N point of Mindanao.

Si-asson'set (abridged to 'Seonset') a post-village and summer resort of Nantucket co., Mass., on the SE extremity of Nantucket Island, and 7 miles SE. of the village of Nantucket.

Sissal, se-sa-lu, the chief island of the Tapal group, Bulu Archipelago, Philippines Islands. On its W shore is a pueblo of the same name.

Sistiana, a town of European Turkey in Macedonia, vilayet of Monastir 66 miles WSW of Saloniki. It is noted for its wine. Pop. estimated at about 7000. The inhabitants are in large part Tinkars, belonging to a southern fragment of the Roman (Wallach) nationality.

Sinton, se-4-tu a pueblo of Negros Island, Philippines Islands near the extreme S point. Pop in 1903 10,074.

Sib, a town of Arabia, on the Arabian Sea, 23 miles SW of Muscat.

Sibulan, se-sa-lu a pueblo of Antique province, Panay Philippine Islands, on the Bay of Sibulan and near San José de Buenavista. Pop in 1903, 12,461.

Siberia, si-bee-re-a (Russ Sibir se-béer) a vast region in northern Asia, forming part of the Russian Empire and in its official conception comprising all the possessions of Russia in Asia except the Caucasian territories and what is collectively known as Russian Central Asia. Parts of the governments of Perm and Orenburg that lie E of the Ural Mountains are excluded from this definition. It comprises the governments or provinces of Tobolsk, Tomsk, Yeniseisk, Irkutsk, Yakutsk, Transbaikalia, the Amur, Primorskays (the Maritime Province) and the island of Kamchatka (the southern half ceded to Japan in Sept. 1905). It lies in the main N. of the 50th parallel of N. latitude (reaching in Primorskays, southward of Vladivostok nearly to lat 32° N), and projects in Cape Tchelyuskin, the most northerly point of the whole land of the eastern hemisphere, to lat 77° 46'. The E and W extent of the land is through 130 degrees of longitude, from the meridian of 20° E to 148° 46' W (190° 20' E) at Cape Dezhnev (East Cape). Area, about 4,800,000 sq m or nearly three times that of all the non-Russian portion of Europe. The boundaries of this vast region are European Russia on the W where the low and greatly denuded and eroded Ural Mountains form a not very prominent boundary for some distance in the NW, the Arctic Ocean in the N, the Bering Sea and Strait, the Sea of Okhotsk (which cuts off the large peninsula of Kamchatka) and the Sea of Japan in the NE and E, and the Chinese dominions (Manchuria, Mongolia, Hobdo) and Russian Central Asia (Semipalatinsk, Akmoinsk, Turgai) in the S. Much more clearly defined than the Ural Mountains on the W are the mountains which extend for about three-quarters of the full length of the southern border—the Altai and Sayan mountains in the W and the more easterly Yablonoi and Stanovoi mountains, the last named, stretching from near Transbaikalia to East Cape, being rather a plateau elevation than a mountain range, with its steeply escarped face looking down upon the region to the S.

Aspect of the Land.—Nearly the whole of Siberia eastward to and for some distance beyond the Lena River is a vast plain a direct continuation of the plain of Russia, almost without interruptions by hills or mountains of any kind and falling off gently to the N where it is continued as a continental shelf or shallow beneath the Arctic Ocean. The land is in fact, of comparatively recent emergence from the northern sea, to which the greater number of the main rivers direct their courses. Lake Baikal, a relict of the former oceanic basin, and still containing certain forms of marine life identical with or closely related to types still living in the oceanic waters (seals etc.) lies at an elevation of only 1564 feet above sea-level although removed from the coast-border by a distance of approximately 1500 miles. In the western part of this vast plain there are large areas of swamp, steppes, and morasses, or the Barab steppes between the Ob and the Irtysh where the general elevation hardly exceeds 800 ft. and where the water partings or divides are so low that temporary connections between different river-systems are easily effected at times of flood-waters. To the E. of the Lena River a number of broadly parallel mountain elevations or ranges (Verkhoynsk, Kolyms, etc.) trending in a generally N and S direction rise out of the plateau-surfaces and give to this section of Siberia a mountainous character. The highest known non-volcanic summit of Siberia is the Elbrus (White) Mountain in the Great Altai, near the borders of Semipalatinsk, the elevation of which is now thought to be 14,800 ft. It seems not improbable, however that in the Katanya or Katansk Mountains, lying to the NW of Bielukha, and in which the Pillars of the Katanya seemingly rise to 12,700 ft., elevations may be found surpassing that of the White Mountain. Other elevations of from 9000 to 12,000 ft. are found in the Yablonoi and Sayan mountains, and in the Stanovoi the highest points rise above 8000 ft. In the peninsula of Kamchatka the dominant summits are largely volcanic, a number of more or less active and extinct cones rising to 14,000–15,000 ft. (Kluchevskaya, active as late as 1854, 16,780 ft.) See KAMCHATKA.

Rivers.—No country of the world excepting Brazil has so many water-courses of the first magnitude as Siberia, where several of the rivers (Ob, Yenisei, Lena, and Amur) have a length exceeding 2500 miles. On the other hand, with the exception of the Amur the Siberian rivers are ill adapted for navigation, since they are frozen up during the greater number of months of the year, and their mouths, owing to the presence of Arctic ice, are even in the seasons of heat not readily attainable or passable. Owing to unequal melting of the river ice, the streams are subject to periodical overflows which extend far over the bordering land-masses. Steam navigation has been established on the upper and middle courses of some of the major waters and their tributaries,—Ob, Irtysh (a tributary of the Ob) Yenisei, Angara (tributary of the Yenisei) Lena, and Amur (from the heart of Transbaikalia) completely to its mouth, opposite the island of Baghalin. Other rivers are the Tom a tributary of the upper Ob; Salanga, a southern feeder of Lake Balkhal; Vitim, Olekma, Vilyui, and Aldan tributaries of the Lena; Yana, Indigirka, and Kolyms and the Shilka, Argun and Uumri, the first two the head-streams and the last-named a large tributary of the Amur. There are few lakes of importance in Siberia, but Lake Baikal which has the extraordinary depth of 6018 feet—much the greatest known depth of any lake on the earth's surface—covers the largest area of any enclosed body of water of Eurasia excepting the Caspian and Aral seas, having nearly 80 times the area of Lake Geneva in Switzerland. The presence of high level beaches shows that the waters have been receding.

Climate. Vegetable Productions. Animals.—The climate of Siberia is one of accented summer heat and winter cold, the latter especially being well emphasized. No statement of average annual temperature gives a proper understanding of the local conditions of this region. While close to or even beyond the 70° parallel of N. latitude, and directly on the borders of the frozen ocean a summer (July) reading of 90° in the shade was found by Baron von Toll the usual winter conditions at Yakutsk lying S. of the Arctic Circle, and consequently S. of the true Arctic tract show a winter cold of —80 to —75° and at the polar settlement of Verkhoyansk in lat. 67° 32' N an extreme of —90° has several times been reported. This central Siberian region seems to have the lowest extreme cold that has at any place been recorded hence it is called the cold-pole of the globe. In the region about Yakutsk the soil appears to be permanently frozen from a few feet below the surface to several hundreds of feet, and the ground contains many layers of fairly thick and horizontally deposited ice, believed by some geologists to be relicts of the ice of the Glacial or Great Ice Period. In some parts of Siberia, especially in the E. the atmosphere absorbs comparatively little vapor and hence there is little precipitation even the snowfall being so light as to permit of little use of sleds in travelling. The vast northern sections of Siberia along almost the entire E-W extent of the Arctic Ocean are in the form of tundra, a partially frozen morass or swamp, the continuation of the similarly constructed region of Russia, supporting ordinarily only a lowly growth of moss, lichen and grass which is here and there interspersed with a few flowering plants. In some sections the tundra is decked with a myriad of flowers and flowering plants, most pleasing to the eye and attracting an abundance of animal life. Southward of the zone of tundra (or barren lands) extends a long belt of woodland, little broken except where water-courses cut their way across, and sweeping over almost the entire E. and W extent of the land. To this again succeeds the lower or third belt (some) of vegetation that of the woodland and forest of the mountain-dopes continuous with that of Russia, and majestic in its great and sombre solitudes of pine, spruce, oak, maple, birch, birch and poplar. This is, perhaps, the largest continuous extent of forest land in the world with the exception of the Amazonian forest. Seebach found high timber (conifers) following the courses of some of the river-valleys, as the Yenisei, to the 60th parallel of latitude. The protracted heat of the long summer days develops in many parts of southern Siberia a rapid and luxuriant growth of grasses, and it is found that a fairly large area of the surface can be put to a successful cultivation of the cereals. In 1903 according to a somewhat incomplete report, there were about 8,800,000 acres under crop-cultivation. It is thought that the available agricultural land, most of it in the SW region, is many times this amount. The crops, in the order of their importance, were hay, wheat, oats, and rye, the wheat having yielded 86,866,000 bush in 1903. The production of hay is very large. Potatoes are extensively cultivated.

The animal life of Siberia is fundamentally that of north and Europe, to which a number of more distinctive Arctic and steppe types are added. The common quadrupeds are the bear (including the Polar bear) gibbon several species of fox, lynx, martin, sable, ermine, wolf, bear, beaver, muskrat, and marmot. One or more species of wild equines and several species of deer and antelope are also found. The big horned sheep (or argali) inhabits some of the mountainous tracts. The reindeer and camel, in their domesticated forms, are largely used in transportation; the camel, of the two-humped (or Bactrian) species, breeding even in the region of Lake Balkal. The tiger, together with the panther frequently appears in Transbaikalia and is surprisingly abundant in the valley of the Amur. As a member of the Siberian fauna may, perhaps, properly be included the mammoth which not improbably survived the extinction of its tribe elsewhere, and whose remains are abundantly distributed through the frozen soils of the tundras and the lower river-valleys. The remains of extinct species of rhinoceros, lion, buffalo, and horse, as well as of the mammoth are found in the late deposits of the New Siberian Islands (Lushkov).

Minerals.—The mineral wealth of Siberia is still largely undeveloped, and mining operations except in the Ural region have been but indifferently prosecuted. Gold occurs in gullies and in placer-deposits the latter being probably distributed over a large part of the surface, and having an origin similar and allied to the deposits of Alaska and the Yukon region. The Ural Mountains have long been worked for gold, silver, lead, copper and platinum. Other mineral deposits are those of salt, coal, sulphur, chromium and mercury. Valuable graphite mines have been opened on the lower Yenisei. Among the precious stones the Siberian emeralds and topazes have long been famous.

Population. Towns, Railroads, etc.—The population of Siberia in 1897 was 5,737,000. Over two-thirds of the inhabitants are Russians. The next largest element is that of the Kirghizes. The remainder of the population consists mainly of Barluts (a Mongolian people) and Yakuts (a Tatar-Tartar people). There are also Tungusians, Samoyeds, Ostyaks, etc. Among the more important towns of Siberia are Tomsk with a population in 1897 of 52,436, the seat of a university. Irkutsk (pop. 51,434) Omsk, Tobolsk, Krasnoyarsk, Yakutsk, Blagoveshchensk (in the Amur province) and Vladivostok an important naval station and Pacific port (in Primorskaya). Siberia has the longest continuous line of railway in the world the Trans-siberian, extending from Kargan on the Tobol (whence it is in direct continuation with Moscow and St. Petersburg) on the frontier of European Russia, to (after crossing Manchuria) Vladivostok or over a distance of 4500 miles. The road was begun in 1891 and virtually completed in 1902. A branch of this road extends from Harbin (in Manchuria) to Port Arthur. The full length of line from St. Petersburg to Port Arthur is 5620 miles.

History.—The Russian conquest of Siberia was inaugurated in 1581-82, when the intrepid adventurer Yermak Timofeyev at the head of a small band of Cossacks, took the town of Sibir (Irkutsk) on the river Irtysh the capital of the Tartar khan, Kutchum and presented a vast territory to the czar. The advance of the Russians was extremely rapid. As early as 1618 they founded the town of Yeniseisk which became a great centre of the trade between Siberia and Europe. By the end of the seventeenth century they were in possession of Kamchatka. The territory of the Amur was acquired from China in 1858. Siberia has been used as a place of confinement or banishment for criminals and political offenders. It is estimated that about 150,000 persons belong to these two classes. Deportation has recently been reduced to comparatively small dimensions.

Sicilies, The Two, the name of a former kingdom comprising southern Italy and Sicily. In the Middle Ages the name Sicily on this side of the Faro (i.e. the Strait of Messina) came to be applied to the southern part of the Italian main land in contradistinction to Sicily beyond the Faro (i.e. the island of Sicily). About the middle of the eleventh century the Normans wrested Apulia and Calabria from the Byzantines (Greeks) and before the close of the century they completed the subjugation of Sicily which had been under the sway of the Saracens. In 1177 the Norman conquests in Italy were halted with Sicily and in 1190 the ruler assumed the title of king of Sicily. About this time the territories of the duchy of Naples (founded early in the Middle Ages by the Byzantines) were swallowed up in the possessions of the Normans, whose sway also extended over the dominions of the former principality of Salerno and Capua. In 1194 the Norman rule in the kingdom of Sicily was succeeded by that of the Hohenstaufens, famous in the annals of the German Empire. In 1266 the Hohenstaufen dynasty was overthrown by the house of Anjou. In 1282 Sicily shook off the yoke of Anjou, mother Italy remaining under the rule of that house as the kingdom of Naples. Sicily placed herself under the rule of Aragon a connection which was severed in 1296 to be renewed in 1415. Angevin rule in Naples was succeeded in 1442 by that of Aragon. In 1458 Naples again became an independent kingdom. It was momentarily in the possession of the French in 1495. In 1501 it became a joint conquest of France and Aragon and in 1503 the Spaniards became masters of the whole (Naples and Sicily being now both subject to Ferdinand of Aragon). At the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701-13) Spain ceded Sicily to Savoy and Naples to Austria, which power obtained Sicily in 1730 in exchange for Sardinia. Don Carlos of Spain wrested the Two Sicilies from Austria in 1734-35 and inaugurated the Bourbon dynasty. In 1789-99 the French conquered the kingdom of Naples and established the Parthenopean Republic which was short-lived the Bourbon king Ferdinand IV being restored to his throne in the course of 1799. In 1806 Napoleon conquered Naples and placed upon the throne his brother Joseph who was succeeded in 1808 by Murat. Ferdinand maintained his authority in Sicily which the French were prevented from seeing by the English and in 1815 he was restored to the Neapolitan throne. In 1816 he made of Naples and Sicily a consolidated realm the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, assuming the title of Ferdinand I. In 1860 with the aid of Garibaldi, the Sicilians and Neapolitans rose successfully against the despotic rule of the Bourbons, and in the same year Victor Emmanuel annexed the Two Sicilies. Gaeta, the last stronghold of the Bourbons, fell early in 1861, and immediately after the Two Sicilies became part of the kingdom of Italy. The kingdom of Naples comprised all of continental Italy to the S. of the Papal States. It is now comprised in the compartments of Abruzzi e Molise, Campania, Apulia, Basilicata, and Calabria.

Sicily, sī-lē (It. Sicilia, se-choe'-le-ā and Sicilia) the largest island of the Mediterranean Sea forming with some neighboring isles a compartment of the kingdom of Italy. It lies between lat. 36° 38' and 38° 18' N. and is separated on the NE from the Italian main land by the Strait of Messina, which in its narrowest part is not over 2 miles in width. In shape it is triangular, length from E to W 185 miles, greatest breadth (in the extreme E.) 120 miles. Area, about 9700 sq. m. At the NE angle is the promontory called Punta del Faro at the SE angle, Cape Passaro and at the W extremity Cape Boeo. The most striking feature of Sicily is the volcano of Etna, which towers near the E coast to a height of about 10,754 feet. The island is covered with mountains. Nearly every portion of the surface is elevated, there being only a few low lying tracts of any extent, which are situated along the coast, the principal plain being that of Catania, to the S. of Etna. The N coast presents a bold mountain front as viewed from the water. Near the middle of this coast, a few miles from the shore, is the Plaza dell'Antenna in the Madonina range (La Madonina) the highest peak of the island after Etna, with an elevation of nearly 6500 ft. Rocky cliffs extend along a great part of the E coast. The island of Sicily is properly a part of the Apennine system of the peninsula of Italy, from which it was separated by a subsidence trough or rift during some portion of the Pliocene period of geological time. In a similar way it was disrupted from the African continuation of the Apennines in Tunisia, the Atlas Mountains. The development of volcanic disturbances on and about the island seems to be linked to these crustal movements.

Numerous rivers descend from the mountains. The volume of water in them is small during most of the year and many of them are entirely dry in summer. The largest streams are the Simeto (Giarretto) which waters the plain of Catania, and the Saleto, Platani and Molise, which empty into the sea on the S coast.

Sicily has for the most part a delightful climate. The heat of the almost rainless summer is not excessive except when for a brief time the hot breath of the sirocco sweeps over the island, and the waters are very mild, snowfalls occurring seldom except on the mountains. The flora of Sicily is extremely rich, presenting a great variety of sub-tropical forms. Among the characteristic plants are the dwarf palm, date palm, agave, prickly pear, and cereus. The banana thrives. The floral landscape presents an endless succession of olive, orange, and lemon groves with plantations of almonds, figs, pomegranates, and pistachios. The highest slopes of the mountains (excepting Etna) are clad with forests consisting of oaks and other trees of the temperate zone, and in the middle and lower slopes there are magnificent growths of chestnut and hazel. The interior of the island is largely a treeless plateau, on which stretch interminable fields of wheat and barley and whose aspect presents alternately the brilliant verdure of the growing season and a parched and naked landscape. Among the vegetable products of Sicily in addition to those mentioned are beans, peas, suncho, flax, tobacco, and licorice. The mulberry is cultivated to a considerable extent. A large part of the agricultural land consists of vast estates cultivated by peasant tenants. Sicily is one of the principal sources of the world's supply of sulphur. Salt is an important product. Amber is found on the coast near Catania. The tunny and anchovy fisheries are on a large scale.

The island is in the main a rural region. It has many towns of considerable size, but few of them have any industrial importance, most of them being merely rural communities. Under the oppressive rule of the Neapolitan kings the island remained materially and intellectually in an extremely backward condition. Much progress has been made since it became a part of the kingdom of Italy. The largest cities and principal seaports are Palermo (the capital), Messina, and Catania. Each of these cities has a university. Other prominent towns are Marsala, Acireale, Trapani, Caltanissetta, Syracuse (Siracusa), Sciacca, and Girgenti. Sicily comprises the provinces of Caltanissetta, Catania, Girgenti, Messina, Palermo, Syracuse, and Trapani. The Sicilian nationality is a very mixed one, the blood of Greeks, Carthaginians, Romans, Arabs, Berbers, Normans, Albanians, and other peoples having been mingled with that of the ancient Siculi. There is a Sicilian dialect of the Italian, which is very distinct from the dialects of the main-land, and which has lent itself to vigorous literary expression. Sicily is a most inviting region for tourists, with its many lakes and semitropical character, its mountains and its picturesque coasts, its old towns perched on steep heights, and the numerous remains of Greek edifices and feudal castles. Pop. in 1882, 2,927,991; in 1901, 3,229,797; estimated for 1904, 3,647,900.

Sicily was in ancient times the seat of many flourishing Greek colonies founded between the middle of the eighth century and the close of the first quarter of the sixth century B.C. Among the most celebrated of the Greek cities were Syracuse, Agrigento, Leontini, Catania, Megara Hyblaea, Gela, Zancle (Messina, Messina), Himera, Myla, and Selinus. The island shared fully in the intellectual activity of the Greek world. Carthage extended her dominion into Sicily and sought to conquer the Greek cities, and was partially successful. At the close of the first Punic War (264-241 B.C.) Carthage relinquished Sicily to the Romans who in 219 B.C. became masters of the island by the conquest of Syracuse. After the fall of the Roman Empire, Sicily came under the sway successively of the Goths, Greek emperors, Saracens, and Normans who early in the twelfth century established the kingdom of Sicily which included the southern part of Italy. For the subsequent history of the island, see Syracuse, Two Towns.

Siena, see sd na, often written Sienna (anc. Sena Julia and Colonia Senensis), a city of Italy in Tuscany, capital of the province of Siena, situated at an elevation of more than 1000 feet above the sea, between two affluents of the Ombrone 31 miles SE. of Florence. Siena holds a prominent place in the history of art from the thirteenth century to the sixteenth ranking only after Rome, Florence, and Venice in importance. Encircled by its old walls, with narrow winding streets, stately palaces and splendid churches, it still presents the aspect of a medieval town. On a height dominating the city rises the thirteenth-century cathedral, with a richly decorated facade of red, white, and black marble, designed by Giovanni Pisano, and with a dome and campanile. The beautiful interior contains an interesting pavement portraying biblical scenes a famous bronze statue of John the Baptist, by Donatello, and a superb pulpit, in part the work of Nicolo Pisano. Other noteworthy ecclesiastical edifices are the fourteenth-century church of San Giovanni, with a handsome though unfinished facade the church of San Francesco, recently restored with fine sculptures and paintings San Domenico, containing the chapel of St. Catherine, with beautiful frescoes; Fontegaria, with a superb high altar, Degli Innocenti Sant'Agostino, and San Martino, all rich in works of art and the oratory of San Bernardino, with paintings by Sodoma. The splendid cathedral library has decorations by Pinturicchio, and a famous antique group of the Gracchi brought from Rome. Among the most interesting secular structures are the brick Buonaguardi palace in Gothic style the stately Palazzo del Governo, housing the valuable archives of Siena the brick Palazzo Pubblico dating from the thirteenth century and the Opera del Duomo, with splendid art collections. The educational institutions of Siena comprise a university famous in the Middle Ages, but now possessing only the faculties of law and medicine the Reale Collegio Tolomei, the Institute of Fine Arts and the public library containing 75,000 volumes. The town is the seat of an archbishop. Siena has manufactures of textiles and hats. In the latter part of the Middle Ages Siena was one of the most flourishing and powerful of the Italian city republics and is said to have had a population of over 100,000. In the middle of the sixteenth century it was annexed to the Florentine dominions. Pop. in 1901 29,335.

Sierra Leone, 20-40°N, 10-10°W (Sp. prod. 10-20°N, 14-0°W) a British colony on the W coast of Africa, extending as a narrow border-strip from French Guinea (Riviera du Sud) on the NW to Liberia on the SE or over a coast-line of about 180 miles. Area, about 4000 sq. in. Sherbro Island and the Bananas, Plantains and other infertile form part of the colony. The coast-line is indented by the broad estuary of the Sherbro, by Lawry Bay and the estuary called the Sierra Leone River. The surface near the coast, though in some places rocky is generally flat, but the interior is covered with rugged hills, some of which seem to attain elevations of 3000-3000 feet. The Protectorate of Sierra Leone, which was constituted in 1895, extends inland about 180 miles, and has an area of about 25 000 sq. m. It is well watered by streams (the largest of which are the Great and Little Scarcies, Rokella, and Jong) whose courses are directed to the Atlantic Ocean.

The climate of Sierra Leone is markedly subequatorial along the coast, and even in the interior it is one of the worst of all Africa. The average annual temperature at Freetown the capital is about 86° and the annual rainfall ranges from 140 to upward of 200 inches. The soil is very fertile, growing excellent crops of rice, maize, yams, plantains, pumpkins and cassava; sugar coffee, indigo, ginger and cotton thrive well. The principal fruits are the coconut, banana, pine-apple, orange, lime, guava, papaw and pomegranate. The forests are extensive, and many of the trees are of gigantic dimensions.

The chief exports are palm oil and kernels, pepper oil seed, kute-oute, rubber, copal, ginger ground out, baidim, ivory and beeswax. The British colony of Sierra Leone may be said to date from 1787 when the first detachment of fugitive slaves was sent thither by a company formed with the intention of making the region a home for free negroes and proving that colonial products could be valued without slave-labor. Its affairs are administered by a governor who is assisted by executive and legislative councils. Pop. of the colony in 1907 76,655, of whom 44,444 were whites; of the metropolitan, estimated at about 1,600,000.

Sierra Madre, se-á-ná má-nri, the name applied in a rather vague way to the main mountain-masses of Mexico, those which form the eastern and western walls (respectively Sierra Madre Oriental and Sierra Madre Occidental) of the great central plateau, and which are now known to form integral parts of that plateau, extending in more or less parallel ridges (folds) from its northern to its southern boundaries. These main ridges, composed chiefly of Cretaceous and earlier limestones in the E and of volcanic rocks in the W converge, with an accessory western portion, the Sierra Madre Pacifica, to a uniting knot in the state of Oaxaca (the mountain of Zempoaltepéc) and are thence continued in one or more branches (into Central America. No direct orographic or structural relationship has as yet been established between any of these main ranges and the Andes of South America, nor have the full relations with the mountains of the United States in the N been determined. There would seem at this time to be no fundamental connection existing between the Sierra Madre Oriental and the true Rocky Mountains such as is so frequently assumed. The Sierra Madre Oriental rises in its southern parts to 1000-8000 feet, supporting on its exposed flanks and in succeeding zones a luxuriant vegetation of palms coccolutina, melastomes orchideaceous plants, ever green-oaks, and conifers. On its crests are implanted some of the giant volcanoes some of the republic (Poconotepetl, Orizaba, Cofre de Perote, etc.). The western Sierra Occidental is generally of a more rugged character being deeply incised by numerous water-courses, and reaches a generally higher elevation (8000-12500 ft.).

Sierra Mojada (mo-si dá), a mountain range of Mexico, in the western part of the state of Coahuila, near the Boisen de Mapamí. Height, about 5200 feet. At its northern termination is the small town of Sierra Mojada.

Bierra Morena, se-4e no-vá ul, a mountain range or complex of mountains of Spain, separating the basin of the Guadalquivir from that of the Guadalquivir and extending from Portugal to about lon 2° W. It constitutes the southern boundary or wall of the central plateau above which it generally rises but 1000-1200 feet, and falls abruptly or in series of deep-marked escarpments, on the side of Andalusia, to the deep valley of the Guadalquivir. The mountain association bears numerous local names and merges eastward into the divisions of the coast mountains. One of the highest summits is the Cerro de Almenara, in the extreme E., 5920 feet.

Sierra Merced (brown range) Cal commences about 10 miles S of San Francisco, and runs through San Francisco co. into Santa Clara co. Height, about 2550 feet.

Sierra Nevada, se-eh nah-vé-oh ('snowy range') the highest mountain range of Spain extending for about 60 miles in an E and W direction through the old kingdom of Granada, and forming part of the great water-shed which separates the waters flowing to the Mediterranean Sea from those flowing to the Atlantic Ocean. Its crest lies only about 25-30 miles from the Mediterranean and the mountains thus rise with marked abruptness. The highest summit is the Mulhacén (Mulhacén) 29 miles SE of the city of Granada, 11,450 feet,—the loftiest point of the Iberian Peninsula. The second summit is the Pico de Veleta, 11,385 feet, which overlooks the deep Corral de Veleta and commands one of the finest views in Europe. It carries minor glaciers. The Sierra Nevada, which is covered with snow during most of the year supports a luxuriant vegetation of olives, chestnuts and oranges on its southern foot.

Sierra Nevada, se-ér-rá na-vá dá, a great mountain-range or buttress of California, mostly in its eastern part and generally considered to extend from the Tehachapi Pass in the S. 100 about lat. $36^{\circ} 10' N$ where the range is de-stepped southward in the direction of the Coast Range) to Lassen Peak in the N. in lat 40° 33' N where its distinctive features are obscured or covered by a continuation of the great lava-fields of Oregon. By some geographers the northern limit is extended to Mount Shasta, beyond which an orographic continuation is found in the Cascade Mountains of Oregon and Washington. The Sierra Nevada is an almost impenetrable barrier over an extent of 400 miles and constitutes the divide between the Great Basin to which it falls with marked abruptness on the E. and the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys on the W. It is much more imposing in general character than the true Rocky Mountains of the interior and contains a number of peaks over 13,000 feet in height and a few exceeding 14,000 ft. Mount Whitney on the borders of Tulare and Inyo cos. in lat. 36° 34' N. 14,998 ft.—considered the loftiest summit of the United States outside of Alaska; Fisherman Peak 14,443 ft. Mount Corcoran, 14,093 ft. Keweenaw Peak, 14,008 ft. Mount Brower 13,886 ft. Mount Lyell, 13,042 (13,317) ft., Mount Dana, 13,325 (13,600) ft. Structurally the Sierra Nevada is distinguished by its steep and narrow valleys, bounded by almost vertical walls of rock thousands of feet in height and presenting a type of scenery of surpassing grandeur. Such valleys are the Yosemite, the Hetch Hetchy (a short distance N of the Yosemite) and King's and Tuolumne cañons. Many of the higher summits are covered with perpetual snow and there are a few minor glaciers. The evidences of past glaciation on a vast scale are strongly marked. Much of the region is still densely forested, with giant conifers extending to the 7000-8000 foot level. The Sequoia gigantea is one of its sylvan wonders. The best known passes traversing the mountains are the Truckee in the N. the San Joaquin in the centre, and the Tehachapi in the extreme S. The Sierra Nevada has in its greater part a granitic axial core which supports marine strata ranging from the Carboniferous to the Cretaceous period, and is seemingly a faulted block of the earth's crust.

Sierra Nevada de Cocony (or Coeni) a lofty mountain of the Eastern Cordillera of Colombia, in the NW part of the department of Boyacá. It is the diverging point of the Sierra de Parí and the Sierra Nevada de Mérida of Venezuela.

Silesia, sil-ee-she-s (Ger. Schlesien, chil-ee-sh) a province forming the SE portion of Prussia, bounded on the E by Russian Poland and Galicia, on the S and SW by Austrian Silesia, Moravia, Bohemia, and the kingdom of Saxony on the NW by Brandenburg, and on the N by Posen. Area, 15,568 sq. m. The surface in the S is mountainous, in other parts generally level or undulating with areas of elevated plateau. Along the SW border extend the Sudetic Mountains, whose spurs cover a considerable area. Their highest portion is the Riesengebirge (Giant Mountains) whose loftiest summit, the Schneekoppe (3253 feet), is in Silesia. The Oder traverses the region from SE to NW draining nearly the whole of it through its affluents among which are the two Neises, Bober, Malapanne, and Bartsch. The country to the W of the Oder is for the most part very fertile, but the other half of the province is on the whole very unproductive. Silesia is one of the granaries of Germany. Large quantities of potatoes are raised and the beet-sugar industry is extensive. The province is rich in cattle. Nearly one-third of the surface is covered with forests, consisting mainly of conifers. The mineral wealth of Silesia is very great. Most coal is mined here than in any other province of Prussia except Westphalia, the product in 1901 having reached 80,000,000 long tons. Very quantities of iron and zinc-ore are mined and lead is an important product. There are numerous mineral springs, the best known being those of Warmbrunn and Salzbrunn. Manufactures are equally developed with agriculture and mining. The textile industry is on a vast scale. In flax spinning and linen-weaving Silesia is the foremost section of Germany. The metallic industries are barely inferior to the textile. The district of Oppeln is the principal seat of the iron-industry. There are extensive manufactures of glass, porcelain and earthenware, chemicals, paper, leather, wooden articles, clothing, etc. Beer and spirits are produced in large quantities.

The population in 1900 was 4,469,337. Three-fourths of the inhabitants are Germans and nearly one-fourth Poles. In 1901 there were 2,589,588 Catholics and 2,443,583 Protestants. The Jews numbered 47,538. The capital of the province is Breslau which is the seat of a university. Silesia is divided into the 3 government-districts of Breslau, Liegnitz, and Oppeln.

In the latter part of the Middle Ages a host of petty states arose in Silesia, many of them ruled by Polish ducal houses. The country gradually came under the overlordship of the kings of Bohemia, becoming a part of the Holy Roman (German) Empire. As part of the lands of the Bohemian crown it became a possession of the Hapsburg (Austrian) dynasty. In 1740-42 Frederick the Great of Prussia wrested nearly the whole of Silesia from Austria.

It is bounded on the W and N by Beluchistan, on the NE by the Panjab, on the E by Rajputana, on the S, by the Kutch and on the SW by the Arabian Sea. Its southern extremity is a few miles N of the Tropic of Cancer. Area about 51,000 sq. m. of which the native state of Kharpur comprises about 6000 sq. m. Sindh is traversed from N to S by the Indus and includes the large delta of that river. The region is mainly a great alluvial plain with mountains extending along the border of Beluchistan. The coasts are low. The climate is extremely hot and remarkably dry some sections being practically arid. Most of the country is a desert, owing mainly to the lack of rainfall. The soil is in great part a fertile clay baked by the scorching sun and containing salt or saltpetre. The SE corner of Sindh is part of the sand desert of Thar (Thar) or the Indian Desert. A narrow belt of alluvial land close to the Indus in Upper Sindh is rendered highly productive by numerous irrigation canals and the periodical inundations of the river. The cultivated area embraces somewhat more than one-tenth of the whole area of the region. The products include wheat, barley, rice, millet, and other grains, oil seeds, hemp, cotton, indigo, opium, tobacco, sugar and vegetables. Among the domestic animals are large numbers of camels and buffaloes. A railway extends through the valley of the Indus, terminating at the busy port of Karachi (Korachi) the outlet of the products of the region. The population of Sindh (excluding Kharpur) in 1901 was 3,219,919. The inhabitants are mainly of Hindu stock with an admixture of Beluchi blood. There are a large number of Baluch. The local language are one of the Aryan Indian tongues, containing numerous Persian and Arabic elements. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism, the Mohammedans outnumbering the Hindus four to one. Only a small fraction of the inhabitants can read and write. The capital is Karachi. Among other towns are Hyderabad, Shikarpur, Rohri and Sukkur. Sindh passed from the rule of its various emirs to that of the British in 1843.

South Australia, a British colony to Australia occupying the western portion of that island and extending, with what is known as the Northern Territory of South Australia, completely across its N and S extent. Its extreme E and W boundaries are the meridians of 129° and 141° E longitude. The southern shore is almost wholly on the Great Australian Bight (with Spencer and St. Vincent gulfs), while the northern is in great part washed by the Gulf of Carpentaria. The colony is bounded on the E by Queensland New South Wales and Victoria, and on the W by Western Australia. Area, 903,890 sq. mi. Pop. in 1901 362,664, of which number 6096 belonged to the Northern Territory. A large or the greater part of the region is constituted by the vast interior Austral Plain largely of a desert character which in a comparatively recent period was covered by low, stunted waters and at somewhat earlier date (Tertiary epoch) was seemingly traversed by the sea, separating what is now the continent of Australia into an eastern and a western part. This Austral Plain, which in the southern part is broken by minor mountain ranges or hills (Gawler Stuart, and Princes ranges) with mounts Lofty (2330 feet) and Razorback (2500 ft.) as the highest elevations, rises in the interior to a plateau of 600-1000 ft. elevation, and contains a number of shallow lakes partly saline, of interior drainage (Eyre, Torrens, Gardiner, Everard) Lake Amadeus lying in about lat 24° 30' S., has seemingly at times a length of 200 miles. In the Macdonnell and James ranges, in what is known as Larapinta Land, and occupying the nearly true centre of the colony the height of land seems to attain nearly 5000 ft. The only stream of importance that has a permanent course is the Murray River which flows through the SE. part.

The climate of South Australia is generally healthful but marked by a high degree of heat. At Adelaide where the average annual rainfall is 30-25 inches, the mean daily temperature for the month of January (midsummer) is about 86° with a maximum of 112° its mean daily July temperature is 58° with a minimum of about 35°. At Port Darwin on the N coast, where the annual rainfall is about 63 inches, the mean annual temperature is 82°. In many parts of the interior the rainfall is reduced to 10 and 5 inches. Much of the interior is covered by the "mullock" scrub, but in the coast regions, both N and S there is a fairly good representation of the varied Australian flora. (For further general characteristics, fauna flora geology of the region, see AUSTRALIA.) The chief agricultural crop of the colony is wheat the production of which in 1902 was 6,754,912 bushels. Barley and oats are produced in considerably smaller quantities. Gold, silver, and copper are mined to some extent, but the total mineral product in 1902 was less than 200,000. There were, in 1902, 1881 miles of railway in operation. The government of the colony is vested in a governor appointed by the crown, and a parliament composed of a legislative council and a house of assembly the former having 18 representatives and the latter 42. The country has 4 departments. Capital, Adelaide of the Northern Territory. Palmerston. The colonization of South Australia by the British was begun in 1836.

South Carolina, one of the South Atlantic States and one of the original thirteen members of the American Union, bounded N and NE by North Carolina, SE by the Atlantic Ocean, and SW by Georgia, and lying between lat. $33^{\circ} 3'$ and $35^{\circ} 17' N$. It is separated from Georgia by the Savannah and Chattahoochee rivers and is of roughly triangular outline. Area, 36,878 sq. mi., of which 490 sq. mi. cover water-surfaces.

Face of the Country.—Of the coast, mainly to the SW of Charleston lie the flat and low sea-islands separated from the main-land and from one another by a series of shallow sounds and inlets. For about 100 miles inland from the coast the country is level and sandy, covered mainly with pine forests, with occasional rice-swamps. The next belt is the sand-hill country along whose upper border runs the ridge, above which the country is beautifully diversified, rising gradually in the NW to the Blue Ridge, which attains an elevation of upward of 3600 feet. Some of the more prominent summits are Rich Mountain 3560 ft. Mount Pinnacle, 3436 ft. Table Rock, 3124 ft. and Oconee's Head, 3225 ft.

Coast-Line and Rivers.—From Little River Inlet to the Savannah River the coast extends 200 miles in a SW course. Winyaw Bay, Bull's Bay, Charleston Harbor, Stono Inlet, Edisto Inlet, St. Helena Sound and Port Royal Sound afford harbor facilities, but the only first-class harbors are those of Charleston and Port Royal, on the latter of which are the towns of Beaufort and Hilton Head. The chief rivers of South Carolina are the Great Pedee, Santee and Savannah (on the border). The Savannah River is navigable for steamboats to Augusta, Ga., and much higher by small boats. The rivers Ashley and Cooper flow into Charleston Harbor. The Santee, with its constituent streams the Congaree and Wateree, affords steam-navigation to Columbia and Camden. The Great Pedee is navigable for a distance of over 100 miles. The Combahee and Edisto admit of some navigation. Inside the sea-islands the sounds afford a safe and tranquil passage for river steamers. The Cooper and Santee rivers are connected by the Santee Canal.

Geology.—The upper half of South Carolina is mainly Archean, but along the SE border of the belt region there are several detached areas of considerable size which are referable to the Cambrian or Silurian, and upon this older Paleozoic formation rest in places small areas of the Triassic. The level pine woods and coast-lands are Tertiary and Quaternary with occasional exposures of the Cretaceous, as along the Great and Little Pedee rivers, etc. Among the mineral treasures of the state are gold (found in several of the NW counties in veins, nuggets, and gravel), silver ores of iron, manganese, copper and lead, chiefly north-westward. Abundance of kaolin, red and yellow ochre, dolomite and shales suitable for flagging, red, white, and variegated granites and gneisses, marbles, limestone, scapolites, etc. The Trias affords a little coal and some graphite. The quantity of gold mined in 1903 was 4872 fine ounces, valued at $100,700, of silver 309 fine ounces, valued at $102. The mineral of greatest economic importance is the (Post-Phosene) phosphate lime-rock of the low land and river beds near Charleston and also on the Stono, Ashepoo, and Edisto rivers and near St. Helena Sound. The product of this fertilizer in 1903 was 2,08,000 tons, valued at $78,800. The granite industry is important. The value of this rock quarried in 1903 was $470,803 ($696,064 in 1901).

Agriculture and Natural Products.—The sea-islands are specially adapted to the growth of long staple or sea-island cotton and of rice. The tidal swamps, to rice-culture the inland swamps when drained, to corn, cotton, rice, and peas. The oak-and-pine and the oak-and-hickory lands, to corn and cotton. The pine barrens now afford principally naval stores, as well as fruits and vegetables, and give good pasturage. The northwestern region produces corn, wheat, barley, oats, tobacco, and a great variety of fruits including apples, pears, and plums. The fig and pomegranate thrive in the lower counties and the peach and grape flourish everywhere. Cotton constitutes the most important crop of South Carolina. The number of bales produced in 1900 was 881,422. It is also a leading state in the cultivation of rice. The other chief agricultural crops in 1900 were corn 13,189,187 bushels, wheat, 2,142,828 bushels, oats 4,023,149 bushels, rye, 29,265 bushels, potatoes, 335,940 bushels, and hay 182,453 tons. Stock raising and wool-growing are carried on with profit. The native forest trees include several oaks, of which one is the very valuable live green or live oak, the long-leaf and other useful pines, several hickories, and many other important timber trees. The palmetto is a characteristic plant of the lowlands.

The climate of the pines and of the sand hill belt is very dry and equable and is thought to exercise a curative influence upon those afflicted with pulmonary disease. The coast-region was formerly visited by epidemics of yellow fever and malarial tracts are found in the rice-swamps. The mountain region has a delightful summer climate and is much visited by tourists. Alkan which enjoys a dry and equable climate, is one of the most noted of the health-resorts of the Union. The mean temperature for the month of January is about 45° for July 80° (with a maximum summer heat of 105°). The average annual rainfall is be-between 46 and 48 inches. South Carolina was visited by a disastrous earthquake in 1883, which wrecked a large part of the city of Charleston.

Manufactures.—The manufacture of cotton is by far the most important manufacturing industry of the state and in 1900 yielded a product valued at $29,723,919. Second in rank is the manufacture of lumber and timber products, which were valued at $5,207,184. The manufacture of wool, cotton-seed oil and oil-mills, and of phosphates (from the rock deposit already mentioned) flaring, rice-bulking and the tanning and carrying of leather are industries of considerable importance.

Railroads.—The first railroad in the state, the South Carolina B. was built in 1830-33. In 1866 the state had 236 miles of railroad in 1880 373 miles in 1879 1139 miles in 1890 1470 miles in 1897 2297 miles and in 1900, 2630 miles.

Education.—The leading educational institutions of the state comprise South Carolina College, located at Columbia the College of Charleston and the South Carolina Military Academy at Charleston. Porman University at Greenville. Wofford and Converse Colleges, at Spartanburg. Newberry College, at Newberry. Clemson (Agricultural) College at Clemson. College Winthrop College, at Rock Hill. Lander College, at Greenwood. Erskine College, at Due West. Greenville Female College and the Greenville College for Women. Claflin University (for colored) at Orangeburg. Schufeldt Normal and Industrial school at Aiken and various schools of a denominational character.

Counties and Cities.—The counties (formerly districts) are 46 in number—viz Abbeville, Aiken, Anderson, Barnwell, Barnwell, Beaufort, Berkeley, Charleston, Cherokee, Chester, Chesterfield, Clarendon, Colleton, Darlington, Dorchester, Edgefield, Fairfield, Florence, Georgetown, Greenville, Greenwood, Hampton, Horry, Kershaw, Lancaster, Laurens, Lexington, Marion, Marlboro, Newberry, Oconee, Orangeburg, Pickens, Richland, Saluda, Spartanburg, Sumter, Union, Williamsburg and York. The principal cities are Charleston (pop in 1900 55,867). Columbia, the capital (21,108). Greenville (11,868). Spartanburg (11,392). Anderson (5,498). Rock Hill (5,485). Sumter (5,473). Union, Beaufort, and Camden.

Government etc.—The governor and other state officers are chosen for the term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state sends 7 representatives to the lower house of the national Congress.

The population in 1790 was 249,073. In 1800 345,691. In 1810 415,115. In 1820 502,741. In 1830 581,185. In 1840 594,395. In 1850 663,50. In 1860 763,708. In 1870 765,698. In 1880 935,577. In 1890 1,151,149. In 1900 1,240,316. The negro population in 1900 numbered 783,321. The foreign born population in that year was only 5528.

History.—The first attempt to plant a European colony in South Carolina was made in 1562, when Jean Ribault (Ribault) acting for Coligny established a settlement at Port Royal. This was broken up in the following year. In 1663 the province of Carolina was granted by Charles II to a number of lords proprietors. It was divided into two parts North Carolina and South Carolina. The philosopher Locke drew up for Carolina a constitution with an aristocracy of landgraves and censors, a scheme too fantastic and ill-suited to the needs of the settlers to admit of being put into effective operation. By the close of the seventeenth century there were several thousand colonists of various nationalities within the limits of the present state and Charleston was a flourishing little town. In 1729 South and North Carolina were constituted royal provinces. South Carolina was in the van of the colonies in the revolutionary movement. In 1775 her governor abandoned his province, and in 1776 a state government was organized. The region was an important field of operations in the war for independence. The year 1833 witnessed the Nullification movement in South Carolina, an assertion of state rights against the power of the federal government. The state initiated the secession movement in Dec 1860 and the bombardment of Fort Sumter Charleston harbor in April 1861 was the first act of the Civil War. The reconstruction of the state was completed in 1868.

South Caroliton, a banking post-town of Marion co. Ky., on the Louisville and Nashville R. 33 miles S of Owensboro. Pop. in 1900 452.

South Dakota, a northwestern state of the American Union bounded on the N by North Dakota, on the E by Minnesota (from which it is in part separated by Lake Traverse and Big Stone Lake) and by Iowa (from which it is mainly parted by the Big Sioux River) on the S by Nebraska (with the line of division formed by the Missouri River and the parallel of 43° N lat.) and on the W by Montana and Wyoming (the meridian of 104° W lon. constituting the boundary). Area of the land-surface, 76,856 sq. m. of the superficial waters 800 sq. m.

Topography and Drainage.—South Dakota is comprised within the region of the Great Plains and is in the main a plateau of moderate elevation rising from the R. border (where it has a general height of about 1100-1300 feet) westward where the elevation exceeds 3000 ft. The altitude of Lake Traverse is about 970 ft. The surface is divided into two nearly equal sections by the Missouri River which enters the state from North Dakota and, after crossing it in a southeasterly direction forms a part of the southern boundary. E. of the Missouri level and rolling prairie lands predominate. The Plateau de Coteau du Missouri which follows the eastern bank of the river in its passage across North Dakota, extends southward into the state. Along the eastern border line there extends N and S for about 280 miles a long narrow plateau known as the Coteau des Prairies. Throughout this latter elevated region there are numerous small salt lakes without outlets. Between these two plateaus is the narrow valley of the James (or Dakota) River. W. of the Missouri the plain is more uneven the hills and buttes are more numerous, and the elevated region finally culminates towards the SW in the Black Hills. This is a rugged region of upheaval, covering an area of 3500 sq m or more within this state and extending into Wyoming. This district has a general elevation of 4000 feet above the sea, and Harney Peak, the highest point, reaches an altitude of 7316 ft. SE. of the Black Hills are the Bad Lands, or Mancosian Terraces of the early French settlers. Although this portion of the state is usually described as barren and useless land its cañons and some of the level tracts contain a rich growth of vegetation which has to some extent been utilized for grazing. The same bad lands was originally applied to the region to designate the difficulty of travel over it, and had no reference to its scanty vegetable covering. The central and western portions of the state are drained by the Missouri and its tributaries, of which the most important are the Grand, the Moreau, Big Chyenne, Bad and White rivers. The eastern part lies mainly in the valleys of the James and Big Sioux rivers, which are also affluents of the Missouri. Among the lofty elevations of the state are Crook Tower 7140 ft., Warren Peak 6900 ft. and Terry Peak, 7078 ft.

Geology and Minerals.—The greater part of the state is of Cretaceous formation, covered throughout the E. and in some parts of the western Missouri Valley by glacial drift. In the S and SW is a large area of Tertiary deposits as trending southward into Nebraska and Kansas, and westward into Wyoming. In the Black Hills there are exposures of many geological periods, which have been domed up by the granitic and volcanic core of the central (nuclear) mass. The ores found here are of great variety and importance, comprising gold, silver, copper, lead, and tin. In many cases erosion has been so complete as to form rich placer deposits in the valleys and cañons. (See BLACK HILLS.) The gold (nearly all quartz) mined in 1901 was 339 893 fine ounces valued at $3,324,100 of silver 270 000. The deposits of tin (at Harney Peak and W. of Deadwood) are among the most valuable in America. Large tracts of country W. of the Missouri are underlain with lignite, and coal of excellent quality has been discovered in the vicinity of the Black Hills and elsewhere. Natural gas and petroleum are also found. Mica has been mined on a large scale in the Black Hills. Crays, lime, cement, chalk and building stones are abundant. The quartzite or jasper granite of the Big Sioux Valley is famous. The grotesquely-shaped Cretaceous rocks of the Bad Lands abound in interesting fossils, which have been extensively collected in scientific surveys.

Climate.—South Dakota enjoys a dry, bracing climate, with comparatively mild winters, in which even extreme cold is much less noticeable, on account of the dryness of the atmosphere than in the eastern states, which lie in the same latitude. The range of temperatures is, however, extreme, varying from about -40° in the coldest month to 110° or more in the summer. The warm Chinook winds have a moderating effect upon the general winter temperatures. The rainfall is commonly sufficient for the development of the crops, but on account of occasional droughts, a system of artificial irrigation is in some parts necessary. The average annual rainfall varies from 36-40 inches in the eastern section to 15 inches or less in the W.

Agriculture etc.—The natural productions are numerous and varied. In most sections of the state the soil is remarkably fertile and agriculture is the leading industry. Wheat and corn are the staple crops and the quality of the wheat has a world-wide reputation. In the S corn is the important crop. Flax, oats, barley and sorghum are also among the valuable products. The leading agricultural crops in 1901 were: corn, 32,413,519 bushels; wheat, 29,749,684 bushels; oats, 12,453,286 bushels; barley, 1,543,571 bushels; rye, 27,804 bushels; potatoes, 4,030,641 bushels and hay, 2,664,190 tons. Garden vegetables and fruits of various kinds are extensively cultivated. Stock-raising is profitable in all parts of the state. The ease with which corn is raised makes the rearing of hogs a remunerative industry. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 2,422,861 pounds.

Railroads.—A great factor in the growth of the Dakotas has been the facility for transportation afforded by the railroads. Many of the roads were constructed in advance of settlement. In 1890 South Dakota had 2616 miles of rail road in 1900 2950 miles.

Education.—Among the institutions of higher education are the state university at Vermillion, the Dakota University at Mitchell, the Yankton College, the agricultural colleges at Brookings, the normal schools at Spearfish, Springfield, and Madison, the school of mines at Rapid City and a school for deaf mutes at Sioux Falls. There are other colleges, seminaries, and institutions of higher learning under denominational control. The state supports a hospital for the insane at Yankton and a soldiers' home at Hot Springs. The state penitentiary is located at Sioux Falls, and there is a reform school at Plankinton.

Counties and Towns.—South Dakota had in 1900 68 counties—Ys., Armstrong, Aurora, Beadle, Bonhomme, Brown, Brookings, Brown, Brule, Buffalo, Butte, Campbell, Charles Mix, Clark, Clay, Codington, Custer, Davison, Day, Deuel, Dewey, Douglas, Edmunds, Fall River, Faulk, Grant, Gregory, Hamlin, Hand, Hanson, Hughes, Hutchinson, Hyde, Jerauld, Kingsbury, Lake, Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lyman, McCook, McPherson, Marshall, Meade, Meyer, Miner, Minnehaha, Moody, Pennington, Potter, Roberts, Sanborn, Sully, Spink, Stanley, Sully, Tripp, Turner, Union, Walworth, Washington, Wapeton and Yankton. Jackson Pratt, Preble, Sterlig, and Todd counties have been organized since the census. The Pine Ridge Cheyenne River Rosebud Standing Rock Sisseton and Wapeton Indian reservations are in this state. The principal towns are Sioux Falls (pop in 1900, 18 286), Pierre, the capital (2306), Lead (2310), Yankton (4125), Aberdeen (4087), Mitchell (4655), Deadwood (3498) and Watertown.

Government, etc.—The governor and other state officers are elected for 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of both serving for 2 years. South Dakota sends 2 members to the lower house of the national Congress.

History.—Population.—South Dakota, as well as North Dakota was included in the Louisiana purchase of 1803. In 1851 Dakota Territory was organized including a great part of what now constitutes the states of Montana and Wyoming in addition to North and South Dakota. The entire white population at that time was less than 3000. In 1858 the area of the territory was much reduced. The population increased to 12 887 in 1870. The discovery of gold in the Black Hills and the opening of the farming lands caused such a growth that the census of 1880 showed a population of 135 180. In 1889 North and South Dakota were admitted as states into the Union.

The population of South Dakota in 1890 was 323,808; in 1900 491 570 including 83 308 foreign born.

Spalium (Sp. Spalium Spalium) L. Spalium a Fr. Spalium a kingdom in the extreme SW. part of Europe, comprising by far the greater part of the Iberian Peninsula. The Balearic and Canary islands are officially included among the provinces of the Spanish kingdom and some small possessions on the coast of Morocco are considered part of it. Continental Spain has an area of 109 000 sq. m. and lies between lat. 36° (Punta Marroquí or Cape Tarifa) and 43° 48' N. and lon. 8° 20' W. (Cape Toriñana) and 3° 19' E. (Cape Cruz). It is bounded on the N. by the Bay of Biscay and France, E. and S. by the Mediterranean Sea, and W. by Portugal and the Atlantic Ocean. The lofty mountain mass of the Pyrenees forms the entire boundary with France (a number of the loftiest summits being in French territory). On the extreme S. the Strait of Gibraltar in its narrowest part about 9 miles wide, separates the kingdom from Africa (Morocco). Within the territorial limits of Spain are included the English possession of Gibraltar in the S. and the republic of Andorra (in part) in the N.

The coast-line, which has an estimated length of some 1400 miles is in general but little indented—the major indentations being the Gulf of Valencia in the E. and the Gulf of Cadiz in the SW.—but it is projected into a number of abrupt or sharp promontories, such as capes Finisterre and Orizuel in the NW., Cape Cruz (Cruz) in the NE., capet Tortosa and Nao in the E. Pales and Gata in the S. E., Turis in the S., and Tráfila in the SW.

Relief of the Land.—The major part of Spain consists of a series of moderately elevated plateaus which together constitute the so-called Meseta, or ancient nuclear buttress of the land, and from which, irregularly dividing it, rise the individual mountain-ranges known under the names of Sierra de Guadarrama (N and NE of Madrid) with the Pico de la Peñalara, as its culminating point, about 7990 (8790?) feet, Sierra de Gredos a southwesterly continuation of the Guadarrama mountains, with the Pico de Almanzor, 8790 ft. Sierra de Gata, extending to the frontier of Portugal the Montes de Toledo 4750 ft. and the more extensive and more complicated Sierra Morena (with the Sierra de Córdoba, Cerro de Almonara, 2920 ft. etc. as minor subdivisions) in the S. The last-named is largely the downfall or escarpment of the central plateau.

The meseta which bears evidence of having been recently and in greater part covered by lacustrine waters has a general elevation of 2000-3000 feet, and occupies with its mountain-spurs virtually the entire region between the Guadalquivir and the Pyrenees and Cantabrian Mountains, corresponding largely to the old divisions of León Old and New Castile, Aragón, La Mancha, and Extremadura. North of the meseta are the Pyrenees (Maladetta or Pic Aneto the culminating point, situated on the border line with France 11 165 ft. Mont Perdú also on the French border 10 994 ft. Pic des Possets, 11 043 ft.) and their westerly orographic continuation the Cantabrian Mountains (Peñas de Europa, 8 45 ft.) (See Pyrenees and CANTABRIAN MOUNTAINS). The mountains S. of the Guadalquivir are chiefly those of Andalusia and Granada, and include the Sierra Nevada (with the Mulhacén SE of the city of Granada, the culminating point of all western Europe outside of the Alps, 11 420 ft.) and the more westerly Sierra de Ronda, the latter manifestly a continuation of the mountain range of Morocco the summit being the Rock of Gibraltar (1364 ft.) on the Spanish side and the Jebel Musa on the African.

The mountains of Spain lack almost wholly the grand majesty of the Alps. The snow and ice mantle is ordinarily of but feeble development, if at all existing throughout the year there are no glaciers of even second magnitude and lakes are practically entirely wanting. The central meseta has in general a bleak and forbidding aspect much resembling the more desolate plains of the western United States, with its buttes and carved escarpments gaudily-colored cliffs and dry water courses. The condition of extreme deformation as the result of which in large areas hardly more than the living vegetation of poplar and other dwarfed trees along river banks and a scanty herbage are to be seen is responsible in greater part for this dreary appearance.

The principal rivers of Spain flowing directly into the sea are, from N to S the Tor, Lobregat, Ebro, Guadalquivir, Júcar and Segura, flowing E. to the Mediterranean and the Miño Duero (Douro) Tago (Tagus) Guadiana and Guadalquivir flowing W and S (some of them through Portugal) to the Atlantic Ocean. The N slope has only the Nalón, the Bidasoa, and some mountain-streams. The chief tributaries are the Ebro and the Pisuerga, which join the Duero the Manzanares, which passes Madrid and joins the Jarama, an affluent of the Tago, the Aragón Gallego and Segre, affluent of the Ebro, and the Guadalquivir. Few of these tributaries are navigable and those generally only for small boats near their mouths. The Guadalquivir is navigable from the sea to Sevilla. The only lakes or lagoons of Spain are Albufera, in Valencia, the Mar Menor in Murcia, and the Laguna de la Janda, NW of Gibraltar.

Climate.—The climate of Spain is one marked by extremes of temperatures and on the whole by a deficiency of rainfall. The sheltered Mediterranean littoral between Gibraltar and Capa Nao has sub-tropical conditions prevailing and the warmest winter climate of Europe, with snow and frost at only rare intervals (average January temperature, 50°-55°). Here are the favored gardens and plantations (huertas) of Malaga, Motril, and Almería, and farther north the palm-groves of Elche, where alone in Europe the date grows freely and bears fruit. In this region the summer heat not infrequently rises to 105° and 110° and even at Sevilla beyond this limit, but still 9° of the plateau, the mercury has been known to rise to 115° in the shade. The climate of the major part of the great interior plateau is characterized by dryness, frequent winds, low winter-temperatures, and high summer-temperatures. At Madrid, which has perhaps the worst climate of any large European city the winter cold is sufficient to freeze the streams and standing waters while the summer heat not rarely exceeds 100°. Over the greater part of the peninsula there is a deficiency of rainfall, rendering irrigation a necessary condition of agricultural development, and giving much of the region a steppe-like character. Heavy rain-storms may, however occur in almost all parts of the peninsula. The average annual rainfall on the table-land of Castile is only 16 inches, and the capital is often exposed to severe drought. Winter is the rainy season. The most noxious winds are the solano (the sirocco of Italy) a hot wind from the S and the gallego, a cold NW wind from the mountains of Gallaia.

Vegetation, Agriculture, etc.—The flora of Spain is pre-eminently of the central European type, but much of it bears a steppe character. Except in the Pyrenees, in the Cantabrian Mountains, in the Sierra Nevada, and in parts of Extremadura, hardly any forest remains. In the sheltered Mediterranean littoral already referred to, the cane, vine, and many tropical and sub-tropical fruits (date, orange, banana, fig, citron almond) are successfully cultivated, but in much of the less favored regions the esparto grass, from which paper is manufactured, is the dominant cultivated product. The olive is a largely representative type of the vegetation of the south as is likewise the mulberry. The cork oak remains as one of the types of the mountain flora. The principal agricultural crops are wheat and barley. Rye, oats, maize and rice are also extensively cultivated and considerable quantities of hemp and flax are produced. Spain is one of the great wine-producing countries of the world. The principal growths are those of Jerez (sherry) Rota, Malaga, Alicante, Malvasia, and Val de Peñas. Considerable silk is produced in Valencia and Murcia.

Animal Life.—The faunal elements of Spain are essentially those of the major part of Europe, with the infusion of a number of types which are almost wholly Mediterranean (or even north African) in character. The bear, wolf, wild-cat, lynx, fox and some other carnivores are still among the denizens of the forested or wider mountain tracts. The chamois and ibex are both found in the Pyrenees. Among domesticated animals, the horses of Andalusia are celebrated and the mules and asses are remarkable for beauty and size. The cattle are of good breeds, and much attention is given in Andalusia and Extremadura to the breeding of bulls for the bull-ring. Goats are plentiful on the table-lands. Sheep-farming although no longer so profitable an industry as formerly is still important, and much attention is given to the perfection of the merino breed.

Minerals.—The mineral wealth of Spain is large and comprises extensive deposits of iron, copper, lead, zinc, cobalt, silver, quicksilver, sulphur, phosphorus, coal and salt. The vast copper deposits of the Rio Tinto and the mercury of Almadén have long been famous. The amount of ore extracted from the different mines in 1903 was as follows: iron 8 904 152 tons; copper 3 69 89 tons; lead and silver lead 357 000 tons; zinc, 164,000 tons; and quicksilver 20 3 0 tons. The output of coal was 2,587 652 tons (from the regions of Oviedo and elsewhere) and of salt 427 000 tons. Mineral water are abundant. The total number of hands employed in the mines in 1903 was 94 351.

Manufactures, etc.—Considering its size and population Spain occupies a very inferior position as a manufacturing country. Outside of its extensively developed metallurgical industries, its manufactures comprise textiles, paper, leather and leather goods, iron and steel wares, tobacco, glass, soap, chemicals, sugar, esparto fabrics, etc. Barcelona has become a great manufacturing center in textile industry being on a large scale. The tobacco manufacture is a government monopoly. There are few good public roads in Spain, except those around Madrid. Much of the transport is effected by means of canals. There were in 1901 8330 miles of railway and 20 170 miles of telegraph lines in operation traversing the country in all directions. From the aspect of its coast-line, its numerous ports its geographical position and its natural products Spain possesses commercial advantages that are shared by but few countries of Europe.

Government, Religion, Education, etc.—According to the constitution proclaimed in 1878 Spain is a constitutional monarchy. The legislative body is known as the Cortes. It consists of a senate and a congress. There are three classes of senators. Senators in their own right (senadores de derecho propio), life senators, appointed by the crown and senators elected for a term of 10 years by the provincial representative bodies, largest tax payers, higher institutions of learning, etc. The senators in their own right comprise royal princes, the wealthiest grandees, high military and naval officers, archbishops and the heads of various high administrative and judicial bodies. The number of senators in this group and life senators combined is not to exceed that of the elected senators. Members of congress are elected by universal suffrage for a term of 5 years.

Voters must be 25 years of age. The capital of Spain is Madrid. Each province has its own legislature, and each minor division, or ayuntamiento (municipality), its own municipal administration. The state religion is the Roman Catholic, with toleration for all sects. There are only a few thousand Protestants and a handful of Jews. The archbishop of Toledo bears the title of Primate of Spain. The convents were suppressed shortly before the middle of the nineteenth century and their property confiscated by the nation. Education is in a very backward state among the mass of the people, more than one-half of the population being unable to read. There are 16 universities: those of Barcelona, Granada, Madrid, Oviedo, Salamanca, Santiago, Saragossa, Seville, Valencia, and Valladolid. Some of these institutions have not all the faculties. That of Madrid has about 5000 students. The national library at Madrid is one of the largest collections of books in the world. The standing army consisted in 1904 of about 93,000 men, exclusive of the Civil Guard (about 20,000) and Carabineros (about 14,500). The war with the United States in 1898 reduced the naval power of Spain to small proportions.

Population.—The following table shows the old divisions of Spain and the modern provinces formed from them with the population as returned in the census of 1900

The following cities had a population exceeding 100,000 in 1900: Madrid (530,583); Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, Malaga, and Murcia. The largest non-Spanish element in the population is constituted by the Basques, who number about 400,000. There are many gypsies.

Colonies.—A hundred years ago the colonial possessions of Spain far exceeded in extent those of any other power. In 1800 (in which year Louisiana was retroceded to France) they embraced all of South America, exclusive of Brazil and Guiana; all of North America S. of the British possessions and W. of the Mississippi (Mexico, New Mexico, California, Louisiana); together with Florida, Central America, Cuba, Porto Rico and other West India islands; the Philippine Islands; the Mariana Islands (Larones) and some possessions on the coast of Africa. Of this vast empire but little remained at the close of the first quarter of the nineteenth century outside of the Philippines and the West India islands, and the war of 1808 with the United States practically terminated the existence of Spain as a colonial power. The colonial possessions at the present day are the following, in Africa: Rio de Oro, stretching along the Saharan coast SSW from Cape Bojador; Rio Muni, on the Gulf of Guinea; and the islands of Fernando Po, Annobon, Corison, and Groot and Little Ellobey.

History.—The Iberian (Spanish Portuguese) Peninsula took its name from the Iberians who inhabited the country before the dawn of history. There was an influx of Celts from the N. and from the union of the two races sprang the Celtiberians. In some parts the Celts retained their nationality. In remote antiquity the Phoenicians had trading posts on the coasts which later were visited by the Greeks. About 220-220 B.C. the Carthaginians conquered the south and southeastern parts of the peninsula, but they had barely succeeded in establishing themselves when they were driven out by the Romans. It was not until 19 B.C. that Rome became mistress of the entire peninsula by the subjugation of the Cantabri. Under the Romans the whole peninsula was known as Hispania. The Emperor Augustus divided the country into three provinces: Hispania Tarraconensis, in the N. and E.; Hispania Bética, in the S. and Lusitania, in the W., corresponding in great part to Portugal. Later the NW corner was set off as the province of Gallia. At the beginning of the fifth century the Vandals, Suevi, and Alani poured into Spain from (and) they were soon followed by the Visigoths who established a kingdom on both sides of the Pyrenees, subducing the Alani. The Vandals passed over into Africa. Towards the close of the sixth century the Visigoths (whose power in Gaul had been destroyed by the Franks) put an end to the realm of the Suevi. The whole of the Spanish peninsula was now a single Christian kingdom.

In 711 the Saracens (Arabs) having completed the conquest of northern Africa, invaded Spain and put an end to the kingdom of the Visigoths. Within a few years almost the entire peninsula was in their power, a little remnant of the Christian inhabitants continuing to struggle for independence in the mountain fastnesses of the NW. Having conquered Spain the Saracens extended their dominion beyond the Pyrenees but here their advance was arrested by the Franks. The Arabs of Spain soon cut loose from the Caliphate and Spain became an independent Mohammedan realm (756). This state the emirate or kingdom (afterwards caliphate) of Cordova, ruled by the Omeyyad dynasty, rivalled in splendor the great realm ruled by the caliph of Bagdad. The Jews participated in this blossoming of Semitic civilization in the extreme W. The dominion of the Arabs had not been long established before the Christian power began to reassert itself vigorously in the NW corner of the peninsula. In the course of the eighth century the little kingdom of Asturias struggled into existence. Little by little the Arabs were pressed back. At the close of the eighth century the Franks conquered the NE corner of Spain (the Spanish Mark later Catalonia). A little later the kingdom of Navarra arose. From the early part of the tenth century the Asturian realm figured as the kingdom of León. Early in the eleventh century the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon took their place on the map of Europe. At this time the Omeyyad caliphate of Cordova fell to pieces and was succeeded by independent Mohammedan kingdoms, which were soon engulfed in the tide of Moorish conquest that swept over from Morocco. In 1085 the arms of León and Castile, new united, added the territory of the kingdom of Toledo (New Castile) to the Christian dominions. A few years later Portugal was erected into a county in become ere long an independent kingdom. Catalonia shook off the French rule and in 1151 was united with Aragon. In the first half of the thirteenth century the Christian monarchs made tremendous inroads into the Mohammedan dominions, which were soon confined to the extreme southern part of the peninsula, the kingdom of Granada. This state, which for a time was very flourishing, succumbed to the arms of Aragon and Castile, which had been united under Ferdinand and Isabella (1479). The Christian sovereigns made their entry into the city of Granada at the beginning of 1492. The same year witnessed the discovery of America by Columbus. The first act of Ferdinand and Isabella after putting an end to the Moorish dominion was the expulsion of the Jews from Spain to the great detriment of the country. In 1512 Ferdinand conquered all of Navarra S. of the Pyrenees (the bulk of the kingdom), so that all Spain was united under his rule. The dominions of Ferdinand included Sardinia, Naples and Sicily.

On the accession to the throne in 1516 of Charles of Hapsburg, grandson of Ferdinand and Isabella and of the Emperor Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy, the Netherlands, then the most opulent country in Europe, were united with Spain whose power at this time overshadowed that of every state in Christendom. The reign of Charles I (who was elected to the imperial throne of Germany in 1519 as Charles V) witnessed the conquest of Mexico Peru, and other parts of America. Most of Lombardy (duchy of Milan) was at this time united with Spain. Under Philip II, the successor of Charles, the Spaniards undertook the conquest of the Philippine Islands. The religious persecutions of Philip II drove the Netherlands to rebellion and the Dutch provinces were lost. From the time of the destruction of the Grand Armada, in 1588, the power of Spain declined steadily. The Hapsburg dynasty came to an end in 1700 and was succeeded by the House of Bourbon. At the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701-14) the dominions of Spain in Europe were reduced to their present dimensions. Gibraltar was in the hands of the English. The Spanish realm in the New World reached its greatest extension in 1763 with the acquisition of Louisiana (retroceded to France in 1800). Between 1810 and 1826 the Spanish colonies in America (except the islands) emancipated themselves from the mother-country. In the war with the United States in 1898 Spain lost Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines and her existence as a colonial power came practically to an end.

Spitzbergen, spits-ber-gen, a group of islands in the Arctic Ocean, between Franz-Josef Land and Greenland and on the western edge of the Arctic Sea. They lie between about lat. 76° and 80° 45' (Seven Islands) N lat. and are crossed centrally by the meridian of 30° E. lon.

The principal islands are West Spitzbergen the largest, Northeast Land (separated from the last by Hinlopen Strait), Edge Island, King-Charles (or Wiche) Land (in the E.), King-Charles Fjorland and Hope Island (in the SE.).

The minor Danes Islands are off the NW coast of West Spitzbergen. Spitzbergen is a mountainous region with general elevations rising to 2000-3000 feet, and with deep fjords extending far into the coast-line (see Fjord, on the W coast 50 miles in length). The highest elevation found immediately S of Treurenberg Bay is 5530 ft., surpassing by nearly 1200 ft. the Hornsundfjeld, near South Cape which was for a long time considered to be the culminating point. Snow and ice cover most of the mountain-summits, but not to the extent of obscuring the underlying orographic features. Glaciers have ordinarily only a local development, but on Northeast Land there is a true (even if minor) ice-cap rising to upward of 2000 ft. The climate is cold, though not excessively so, and recent observations would seem to indicate a higher winter temperature than is found in St. Petersburg (mean temperature for December 23° lowest temperature, in March, -25°). The vegetation is confined chiefly to plants of rapid growth which do not ordinarily rise above 4 or 6 inches, and for the most part spring up flower and seed, in a month or six weeks. During winter which sets in at the end of September the sun remains for four months below the horizon but the darkness of night-time is relieved for about six hours by a faint twilight. The larger forms of animal life are foxes, bears, and reindeer in pursuit of which as well as of walrus and seals, the islands are regularly visited by hunters. Sea-fowl are numerous. The minerals are known to include marble and coal. Many interesting plant-remains, chiefly of Tertiary age, have been found in the islands. Spitzbergen was discovered in 1606 by the Dutch navigator Barents, in endeavoring to effect a NE. passage to India. They are not permanently inhabited and are not claimed by any nation.

Stockholm, stok holm (L. Hus o) the capital of Sweden situated at the E. extremity of Lake Mälar where it discharges into an arm of the Baltic Sea 330 miles N. of Copenhagen. Lat. of observatory 59° 20' 34" N. lon 18° 3' 30" E. Few cities have a more picturesque situation than Stockholm built as it is on rocky and elevated islands and peninsulas cut from the main land by fjords, with primeval forests extending almost within the city limits and stretches of bare granitic rock protruding between the houses. It has often been styled the Venice of the North. The oldest part of Stockholm known as the Städer lies on an island at the extremity of Lake Mälar and is connected by bridges with the rest of the city and with the island of Riddarholm. The old sections are compactly built with narrow streets sloping steeply to the water but the newer portions are attractively laid out with broad avenues open squares and numerous sculptural monuments. There are some beautiful parks. The most striking architectural feature of the place is the imposing royal palace, in Italian Renaissance style. Of the numerous ecclesiastical structures the principal are the Storkyrka the Riddarholm's Kyrka, with a lofty perforated iron spire, the burial place of the Swedish kings, the Katarina Kyrka, and the Tyska Kyrka, in German Renaissance style. Among the notable secular edifices are the Riddarhus (height a house) with an interesting collection of portraits and armorial bearings of Swedish nobles, the stately buildings of the Northern Museum, the National Museum in Renaissance style, containing fine art-galleries and a collection of Swedish antiquities and the new opera-house. Among the monuments are an obelisk erected to the memory of Gustavus III and statues of Gustavus Adolphus and Charles XII. The royal library of Stockholm contains over 300,000 volumes, about 10,000 manuscripts, and one of the largest collections of pamphlets in the world. Among institutions of learning are an institute of higher studies (established in 1875) a medico-surgical institute, a polytechnic school an agricultural academy a school of forestry and a veterinary school. Stockholm is the seat of the Swedish Academy (organized on the model of the French Academy) the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences, and other learned bodies. The royal collection of weapons is one of the richest in Europe. Stockholm is next to Gothenburg, the most important industrial centre of Sweden. It has iron-foundries, Strasbourg (anc. Argentoratum fr. Wendoburg) a city of Germany capital of Alsace-Lorraine and of Lower Alsace, 3 miles W of the Rhine on the river Ill which here divides into five arms, 72 miles N by E of Basel 80 miles ESE of Metz, and 28 miles from the French frontier. Lat. of observatory 48 35 0 N Lon 7° 46 10 E. It is one of the strongest fortresses of the German Empire having a circle of fourteen forts and inner ramparts. There are great works for flooding the approaches to the city. The strong citadel built by Vauban has been demolished. The extension of the lines of circumvallation has made room for the building up of new quarters which present a great contrast to the older portions, which still retain their medieval appearance, with narrow streets and many quaint timbered houses. Foremost among the architectural features of the city is the cathedral (orminster) one of the noblest ecclesiastical edifices in Germany the oldest portion of which dates from the beginning of the eleventh century and which was completed in the main in 1439. It presents every style of medieval architecture from Romanesque to Late-Gothic, displaying remarkable symmetry and beauty. It has a splendid W facade with beautiful sculptures a rose window 45 feet in diameter an imposing tower (165 ft. high) and a famous astronomical clock a wonderful piece of mechanism. Among other edifices of interest are the church of St. Thomas, containing a magnificent marble monument to Marshal Saxe the former episcopal palace, now containing the municipal museum of art the richly decorated modern imperial palace, in Florentine Renaissance style the hall of the Landtag the Hotel de Commerce the so-called Aubette, which has been restored and now houses the conservatory of music the magnificent new buildings of the university and the Groesse Metzel, containing a market and the municipal museum of industrial art. Among the many sculptural monuments of the city are statues of Kieffer and Gutenberg. The anarchy of Strasbourg which held high rank in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and which remained German under French rule, was refounded as the Emperor William University in 1872 and has risen to great eminence under the fostering care of the imperial government. Its library has over 500 000 volumes. The number of students in 1904 was nearly 1400. Among other educational institutions of the city are a municipal library of over 115 000 volumes.

A canal connects the Ill with the Rhine, where there is a port and canal-a-lord communication with the water ways of France. Strasbourg is an important commercial centre in the trade between Germany France and Switzerland. The industrial establishments of Strasbourg comprise manufactures of cigars and tobacco, organs, articles of apparel, machinery etc printing establishments, tanneries, foundries, distilleries and breweries. The pâtés de fougasse of Strasbourg are celebrated. In the northern outskirts of the city lie the beautiful pleasure-grounds known as the Orangery. Pop. in 1911 65,034 in 1901 131 041 more than half of whom were Catholics.

Strasbourg rose to importance in the Middle Ages. In the thirteenth century it emancipated itself from the yoke of its bishops. At the time of the Reformation it was one of the most flourishing of the free imperial cities of the German Empire. In 1681 Louis XIV. annexed it to France. In the war of 1870-71 the city whose garrison was commanded by Ullrich held out heroically against the Germans for six weeks finally surrendering on Sept. 27 1870. The hubbub of Strasbourg dates from Merovin gian times. Stuttgart, a city of Germany capital of the kingdom of Württemberg near the left bank of the Neckar 90 miles WNW of Munich and 38 miles ENE of Karlsruhe. It is situated in the midst of a charming region, surrounded by wooded and vine-clad heights. Stuttgart is architecturally one of the most striking cities of Germany owing to the prevalence of modern edifices in the Renaissance style. The spacious Schlossplatz is the most prominent square. It is enclosed by the imposing Königsbau and Kaiser-Otto-Bau (both modern structures), the court theatre, the old palace, erected in the sixteenth century and the new palace (Residenz-Schloss), built in 1746-1807. The square is embellished with attractive pleasure-grounds and contains a jubilee column in honor of King William I. Near by is the Schiller statue, by Thorwaldsen. The Marktplatz is the centre of the old town which still contains a few residences of the well-to-do burghers of the sixteenth century. The Neckarstrasse, one of the principal thoroughfares widens out into the Neckarkörner, an open space, adorned by Danneberg's water nymph. W of the street is the beautiful Schlossgarten 200 acres in extent, laid out at the beginning of the nineteenth century in the English style. The Königsstrasse leads from the Schlossplatz to the new SW part of the city the Johannesstrasse, lined with modern edifices, is another handsome street. Many of the public places are embellished with monuments, among which may be mentioned the equestrian statue of Emperor William I and the colonial hall of the post-Union.

The Stiftskirche dating from the twelfth century but rebuilt in the fifteenth, and the Hospitalkirche, erected in 1471-93 and restored in 1841 are the principal ancient churches. Among modern ecclesiastical edifices, the gothic church of St. Jahn the Romanesque Friedenskirche, and the Roman Catholic Marienkirche and Nikolauskirche claim attention. There is also a fine synagogue in the Moorish style. The principal secular buildings, in addition to those already mentioned are the industrial museum, new town-hall hall of the choral society (the largest structure of the kind in Germany) art museum royal library (with 500 000 volumes and a collection of antiquities) Realschule, chemical laboratory palace of justice, palace of the crown prince, and polytechnic institute (with nearly 1000 students). The building of the former Karlsbadstrasse possesses an historical interest as the school where Schiller studied medicine. Among other institutions are the conservatory of music, academy of fine arts, cabinet of natural history and veterinary college. The picturesque environs—The Hasenberg Schillerhöhe, Engenplatt, Uhlandsdörfer, etc.—afford charming views of the town and the valley of the Neckar. Stuttgart is an important industrial centre. Among its manufactures are chemicals, textiles, pianos, furniture, chocolate, paper etc. The book publishing business is one of the most important in Germany. covered by the ranges of the Eastern Alps. The main Alpine chain traverses the NW part, entering from Salzburg and extending northeastward between the valleys of the Enns and Mur. Its principal chain here bears the name of Niedere Tauern. It attains an elevation of 9400 feet. In the extreme NW on the borders of Upper Austria and Salzburg the Kalkalpen (Limestone Alps) rise in the Dachstein to an elevation of 9600 feet. In the NE part of the province is the Semmering, one of the most picturesque mountain-regions in the monarchy. The mountains of Styria are interspersed with beautiful valleys. The province contains nearly the entire valley of the Mur, the principal affluent of the Drava. Its course is at first NE and then SE. The Drava traverses the SE part of the province and the Save forms for some distance the boundary on the side of Carniola. The Enns traverses the NW corner. There are a number of small lakes. Styria possesses many mineral springs, among them being those of Gleichenberg, Rohitsch and Römertal. In spite of its mountainous character Styria is a very productive region yielding beautiful crops of all kinds of grain (including maize). The hay crop is very large, and potatoes are extensively cultivated. Excellent wine is made in large quantities, and the orchards are prolific. Among other products are flax and hops. Large numbers of live-stock are reared and the dairy industry is extensively carried on. Nearly one-half of the area of the province is covered with forests which abound in game including the chamois. Styria is rich in iron and coal and the iron and steel industry is on an extensive scale. Salt is obtained in large quantities. The population in 1900 was 1,354,494. Somewhat more than two-thirds of the inhabitants are Germans the remainder being nearly all Slovaks. Nearly the entire population is Roman Catholic. The capital is Graz which is the seat of a university.

Under the Romans Styria was included in the province of Noricum and Pannonia. In the sixth century the Slavs, a Slavic people, poured into the region. Styria was included in the great empire of the Franks. As a frontier territory of the German Empire the region constituted for a time what was known as the Carinthian Mark. One of its feudal princes in the eleventh century assumed the title of Margrave of Silesia (the name of his castle) whence the name of Silesia (Latin Sylva). Towards the close of the twelfth century the feudal rule, which had been erected into a duchy, passed to the duke of Austria. The house of Babenberg. In 1286 Styria became part of the dominions of the Hapsburgs.

Sudan, more correctly Heled-es-Sudan, héd-éssoo-dán, the land of the blacks; called also Nigritia, ne-grith-ee, a vast region of central Africa the limits of which are not strictly defined as regards either geographical or political conditions but which in a general way may be said to comprise the greater portion of the continent lying between the Atlantic Ocean on the W and the valley of the upper Nile on the E and between the Sahara on the N and lat. 5° N on the south. In this extensive region which is traversed by the Niger in its western part and by the Bahr el Ghazal in the E and contains Lake Chad near its centre, a vast diversity of physiographic features is presented, from lofty mountains like those of Adamawa (rising to nearly 10 000 feet) to flat and sterile plains, with stepped-like character and elevated plateaus. There is considerable forest-land, but only occasionally in the forest of that luxuriant type of growth which distinguishes many other parts of the heart of the continent. The climate is hot and fever, especially in the eastern swampy section are not uncommon. The banana, yam, durra, maize, Africana rice, indigo, and pepper are largely cultivated. The fauna is of the distinctively African type, represented by such of the larger quadrupedal forms as the manatee, lion, leopard, elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, hyena, jackal, various antelope, buffalo, etc. Almost all of the Sudanese people are blacks (true negroes, with heathen beliefs and negroes of the Mohammedan faith). Many native sultan-ates or semi-independent kingdoms (as Lorne Sokoto, Kano, Baghirmi, Adamawa, Wadai, etc.) are part of this region. In its present political relations the major part of the Sudan is comprised in the Egyptian or Anglo-Egyptian comprises in whole or in greater part old Nubia, Darfur, Sennar, Kordofan, the land of the Bahr el-Ghazal waters, etc. is in part swampy and malarial but elsewhere it is well adapted to the cultivation of durra, millet, pulse and sesame and contains extensive forests of ebony, gum acacia, bamboo, and rubber along the rivers. The dominion of Egypt was extended into this part of the continent by Meheret Ali in 1820-22. In 1882 the revolt of the Mahdi deprived that country of the control. In 1898 the Anglo-Egyptian army reconquered the country in a campaign culminating in the victory over the Khalifa, the successor of the Mahdi at Omdurman, near Khartoum. The territory

S. of lat 22° N is now under joint British and Egyptian control the two flags flying together. It is divided into 12 to 125° E. The archipelago is divided into 6 groups, as follows, in order from the NE. Basilan, Samal, Sulu (Jold), Siam, Knapuanin, and Tawi-Tawi, with Pangutaran to the NW. In all there are about 180 (mostly volcanic) islands, covering somewhat over 1000 sq m. of which Sulu is chief. The islands are extensively forested with good timber including teak and sandalwood. Among the products are cocoa- and areca-nuts, bananas, bread-fruit, mangoes, and oranges. The natives raise rice, cacao maize, and various alimentary roots. Wild boars and deer are common and oxen swine goats, and poultry are abundant. Ambergris is found on the coast, and much resin is obtained from the forest trees. An important article of commerce is the Sulu pearl or pearl shell (Megala shell). The natives—chiefly Moros or Mohammedan Malays—are ruled by chieftains who are nominally under the sway of a despotic sultan. It was not until the latter part of the nineteenth century that Spain succeeded in asserting her sovereignty over the archipelago. In 1899 the Sultan of Sulu recognized the sovereignty of the United States. The Moros were formerly noted for their piracy. Slavery exists in the islands. Samatra, soo-ma-tre, the westernmost of the Sunda Islands, and after Borneo the largest island of the Malay Archipelago forming part of the Dutch East Indies. It lies between lat. 5° 40' N. and 0° S. and lon. 93° 20' and 100° E. separated on the NE from the Malay Peninsula by the Strait of Malacca and on the E from Java by the Strait of Sunda. Length from NW to SE about 1050 miles. Area estimated at about 180 000 sq m. (by some authorities placed considerably higher). The island is traversed from NW to SE. by a more or less continuous range or series of ranges, of mountains (Menangkabo Barisan, etc.) many of whose dimmeting summits are dormant, extinct or active volcanic cones (Indrapura Peak or Korintj the culminant point of the island about 12 400 feet; Mount Ophir 9650 ft. Dempo, 10 400 ft. and Merapi 9500 ft.) The submeral position of the mountain mass gives a comparatively narrow western border with short and barely servicable water-courses, while on the opposite or eastern side there is a broad and gently falling plain, whose soil is largely composed of the debris of the mountain heights, and across which courses many fairly large and navigable rivers (Palenbang, Jambli or Batang-hari Indragiri Kampar Blak and Baka) on which are located nearly all the more important or populous towns of that section (Palenbang Jambli Ringas, Pale Lavang and Bat). In the NW part of the island is Lake Toba, a sheet of water several hundred sq m. in extent. The soil of the island is very fertile, and the greater part of the region is still heavily forested with myrtaceous and ficaceous trees, oaks, guttapercha, camphor, teak, pine, etc. Tropical fruits grow in luxuriance. Of the native fauna some of the most conspicuous members are the elephant, rhinoceros, tapir, tiger and bear, mountain goat, orang-outang, siamang and farmer and among birds, the arges and peacock pheasants. The metals comprise gold, copper, lead, iron, tin and Tertiary coal (Padang b. g. lands). Some petroleum has also been obtained. The most important of the cultivated products is tobacco. Black pepper is also largely exported. The climate of Samatra is essentially equatorial in character with only moderate variations in temperature and markedly unhealthy over a considerable portion of the lowlands. At elevations of 3000 ft. or more it is both pleasant and salubrious. The average annual temperature on the lowlands is about 80° with the maximum of heat ordinarily in the months of September and October. The annual rainfall is heavy amounting in some places (Padang) to upward of 180 inches. There are few roads in the interior and most of the communication between the different settlements is made by way of the water-courses. The railways have a length of about 200 miles. The population of the island is estimated to be about 3 500 000 mostly natives of a Malay type. Among the best known tribes are the Achineses (the inhabitants of Aehin in the extreme NW) and the Battas (or Bataks) who have preserved their independence in the highlands of the northern interior. Mohammedanism is professed largely by the dwellers in the coast regions. The Europeans number about 5000 and there are some 100 000 Chinese, 2500 Arabs, and 7000-10 000 other foreigners. Among the principal towns are Palenbang, Benkulen, Padang and Aehin. The Portuguese reached Samatra about 1508. The Dutch came about 160 years later and in the course of the nineteenth century they obtained a foothold in the island establishing trading stations. Towards the close of that century the English established themselves at Benkulen. The subjugation of the island by the Dutch has been a slow process, and it is only within the last few years that they have extended their authority over nearly the whole of it, their last great struggle having been with the Achineses. Benkulen was ceded by the English to the Dutch in 1824.

Sunda (sūn dā) Islands, a name of indefinite application comprising according to some geographers all the islands of the Malay Archipelago extending in a general line from Sumatra to Timor (inclusive of these two) or Timor Laut, and by others made to include in addition Borneo or Borneo and Celebes. In this broadest acceptation they are divisible into two main groups, the Greater Sunda Islands—Sumatra, Java, Borneo, and Celebes (with some minor outlying islands as Bliton)—and the Lesser Sunda Islands—Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Sumba (or Sunda wood), Flores, Timor, etc. They separate the China and Java seas on the N from the Indian Ocean on the S. Of the interoceanic passages the best known is the Strait of Sunda, between Java and Sumatra. Physiographically Bali, which is separated from Lombok by the atypical geological Wallace's Line, would seem to be Asiatic, while the remaining islands eastward are Australian or Papuan in character. Apart from certain sections in Borneo virtually the whole region belongs to or is administered by the Netherlands.

Superior Lake, the largest body of fresh water on the globe, and the most elevated of the five Great Lakes formed in the depressions of the basin of the St. Lawrence River. Somewhat more than a third of its waters is in Ontario, Canada, while the rest belongs to the United States, the states touching its shores being Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan (Upper Peninsula). It is about 360 miles long, measured on a direct line connecting Duluth with the R. extremity. The greatest width is about 160 miles, and the area is computed to be 31,000-32,000 sq. in. The mean depth is estimated to be 900 feet, and the greatest depth is somewhat over 1000 ft. Its surface is about 562 ft. above sea-level. The lake discharges through the St. Mary's River which issues from the S. extremity into Lake Huron.

The water of Lake Superior is remarkable for its purity and transparency and abounds in fish, among which are trout and white-fish. The lake receives no large rivers. Its principal tributary is the St. Louis which enters at the W. end and is the remotest source of the St. Lawrence River.

The largest island in the lake is Isle Royale, about 45 miles long, which belongs to Michigan. The waters of Lake Superior are contained in an Archæan rock-basin which gives unmistakable evidence of having been scoured by glacial ice during the Glacial Period. Prior to that period its outflow, similar to that of the Great Lakes generally, appears to have been directed to the base of the Mississippi River instead of to that of the St. Lawrence. Its present catchment basin is exceedingly small. The region occupied by the lake is one of the most highly mineralized in the world, the ores of iron and copper seeming to occur in limitless quantities. The southern peninsular projection known as Keweenaw Point, is a particularly noted copper region.

Its position is the line of outlet of the great grain lumber and ore regions of the interior of the continent has made the lake one of the largest avenues of shipping in the world and its outlet (the St. Mary's River and the Sault Ste. Marie canal) carries a vastly larger tonnage than the Erie Canal. The chief ports or shipping points on its shores are Duluth, Superior, Ashland, Ontonagon, Nough-ton, Marquette, Sault Ste. Marie (on the outlet) and Port Arthur the last named being on the line of the direct Canadian rail-steamship route across the continent. On the border of Alger co. Mich. are found the famous Island Rocks, which form variegated bluffs of 50 to 200 feet on the S. shore.

Syr (anc. Tyre [Anglicized form]) L. Tyres Gr. Τύρος, Phœnician, Su → s. rack Hebrew Tzor) a town of Syria, on the Mediterranean Sea, 45 miles SSW of Beirut and 24 miles SSW of Saida (Sidon). It is situated on the N. side of a little peninsula which was originally an inlet less than a mile from the shore. The ancient city of Tyre stood partly on this island (less than a square mile in area) and partly on the main land. On the S. side of the island was the Egyptian port and on the N. side the Sidonian port. The island was converted into a peninsula through the construction by Alexander the Great in his siege operations, of a great causeway. This was widened in the course of centuries by accretions of sand thrown up by the sea until it became a broad strip of land. Tyre was one of the greatest maritime city-states of antiquity. At the close of the second millennium B.C. it occupied the foremost place among the Phœnician cities, overshadowing Sidon. Its trade extended beyond the Strait of Gibraltar and it was famous for its indus-try as well as its commerce. It was celebrated far and wide for its purple dye and its glass-ware. Carthage was a Tyrian colony. The kings of Tyre ruled over a considerable district on the main-land. The city defied the power of the Assyrians and Babylonians and suffered terribly from long sieges. In the sixth century B.C. it became subject to Persia, under whose dominion it declined. When Alexander the Great was destroying the Persian monarchy Tyre dared to withstand him. It fell after a memorable siege in 332 B.C. The city was still of commercial and industrial importance under the Romans and for down into the Middle Ages. A Christian community existed here from the earliest times. In spite of the huge walls which rendered the island stronghold well-nigh impregnable, it fell into the hands of the Crusaders in 1124. It was held by the Christians until 1291 since which time the place has been insignificant. There are but scanty remains of antiquity. The ruins of the church built by the Crusaders are interesting. On the main-land at Ras-el Ain, is a great reservoir and near it are remains of aqueducts. The town of Sur has about 6000 inhabitants, half Christians and half Mohammedans. Its trade is unimportant. It was visited by a destructive earthquake in 1837.

Surat was formerly for about two centuries, until it was overshadowed by Bombay a place of great commercial importance, and at the close of the eighteenth century it was accounted one of the most populous cities of Asia. Its harbor has been silted up so that only small vessels can reach the city. There is a road lead with deep water at Swally (Suwall) about 12 miles distant. The English East India Company established a factory at Surat in 1612. The Dutch and French came later. For a time the city was the principal station of the English East India Company in India. It has been under British rule only since 1800 although the castle was occupied by the British some time before. After a period of utter decline it rose again into prominence at the time of the Civil War in America, when it was a great shipping point for Indian cotton. It has manufactures of textiles etc. There is a British cantonment here. Pop. in 1901 115,364.

Susquehanna River, a river chiefly of the state of Pennsylvania, rises, as the North or East Branch in two minor forks or head-streams which issue from lakes Schuyler and Otsego, on N. Y. flows generally SW to the boundary line of Pennsylvania, crosses that state in a zigzag course from N to S and after a short traverse of the northern part of Maryland discharges into the head of Chesapeake Bay, at Havre de Grace. The river presents the interesting condition, in its traverse of the state of Pennsylvania, of trenching or gapping several ridges of the Appalachian Mountains. In the lower part of its course the river forms the boundary between the con. of York and Lancaster Pa. The Susquehanna appears as a noble stream in some of its longer reaches, but most of its course is impeded by rapids and boulders, which render it practically unfit for navigation. It is chiefly utilized for the flotation of lumber. It is crossed in many parts by noble railroad and passenger bridges. The chief elements of the river are the Chemung, Lackawanna West Branch and Juniata. Among the more important towns situated on its banks are Binghamton and Owego, in New York Pittston Wilkesbarre and Harrisburg in Pennsylvania and Port Deposit, to Maryland. Total course estimated at 450-500 miles. The West Branch of the Susquehanna River rises on the W slope of the Appalachian Mountains in the west-central part of Pennsylvania and flows NE. E and finally S joining the Susquehanna near Sunbury after a course of nearly 250 miles. Clearfield, Lockhaven and Williamsport are on its banks.

Swabia, or Swabin, svi-ba (Ger. Schwaben shvā-ben) a region in the SW part of Germany comprising parts of Baden Württemberg and Bavaria, together with Hohenzollern. The principal orographic features are the Black Forest and the Swabian Jura. The Danube and the Neckar have their sources here. Among the cities are Augsburg Ulm Freiburg and Constance. The appellation Swabia is derived from that of the Suevi by which name the Alemanni who took possession of this part of Germany at the time of the decline of the Roman Empire, were also known. In the Middle Ages Swabia, whose boundaries originally included Alsace and the eastern part of Switzerland constituted a duchy (known at first as Alemannia). The dukes of Swabia were long among the foremost of the feudal princes of Germany. The duchy was at the height of its power under the house of Hohenstaufen to which dynasty the emperors Frederick Barbarossa and Frederick II belonged. After the extinction of this dynasty (1268) the Swabian duchy was resolved into a labyrinthine medley of principalities petty ecclesiastical states and city commonwealths. One of the circles into which the German Empire was divided at the beginning of the sixteenth century was called the Swabian circle.

The largest cities are Stockholm, Gothenburg, Malmö and Norrköping.

Face of the Land.—Sweden necessarily partakes of the general features of the Scandinavian peninsula, being built up almost wholly of the very ancient Archaean and earlier Palaeozoic rocks (schists, gneisses, etc.) which characterize that region. But the country while here and there, close to the Norwegian frontier rising into lofty elevations (Kebnekaise, in lat. 67° 51' N. 69° 54' (79037) feet, the culminating point of the kingdom, Sarek (Jäkko, in about lat. 67° 16' 00" N. 20° 50' E. 6899 feet) is on the whole not mountainous and rather in the form of an undulating plateau, which by successive terraces falls from the W. eastward into the low lying Baltic plain. It has been estimated that of the total area upward of 50 per cent. lies under 300 ft. elevation and only 8 per cent. attains 2000 ft.—a condition markedly different from what obtains in Norway. The mountains themselves do not present the aspect of backbones or ridges being ordinarily only the continuation of the undulating plateau in part heavily mantled in snow and ice, which has scattered dominating heights or peaks rising above it.

Lakes and Rivers.—Few countries of the world are more extensively watered than Sweden, where it is thought that fully 8 per cent. of the surface is occupied by lakes and rivers. The former in the northern half of the kingdom occupy in the main a zone of 700-1200 feet elevation at closely corresponding distances from the height of land, or Norwegian water-parting and extend NW. and SE. in narrow troughs corresponding to the direction of flow of all the major streams. The largest of these fjord-like lakes, which seem to have been fashioned by ice-action are the Stora Levegö (in the N.) the Horn Älven, and the Storö. The more important and larger lakes which occupy a fracture-depression of the land perhaps structurally related to the Gulf of Finland, lie in the S.—Mälaren, Hjelmaren, Vättern, Vener—and by reason of their low position have permitted of the construction of canalized waters known conjointly as the Göta Canal, to connect the waters of the Baltic Sea with the Cattegat. Lake Vener which covers an area of 2100 sq. m. is the third largest lake of Europe, and its chief tributary the Klar Älf, the most important stream of all Scandinavia. The natural discharge of Lake Vättern is through the Motala-Älf. Other streams between the Torneå on the N. and the Göta on the SW.—but little serviceable, except in their lower reaches or an affording water-power—are the Luleå, Piteå, Umeå, Ängere, Älven, Indals, Ljansa, and Dal all of which flow SE. to the Gulf of Bothnia. There are extensive marshy tracts along the shores. The coast is deeply indented forming vast bays and fjords, and studded with a multitude of low sandy islands, the chief of which are Gotland and Öland in the Baltic. The latter which is separated from the mainland by Kalmar Sound, has good pasture-ground.

Climate.—The climate of Sweden is mild for its northern position, the mean temperature of the year at Stockholm being 43° (January 34° and July 62°) but on the whole it is much more severe than that of Norway. The summers are very hot and the winters extremely cold. Spring is almost unknown. In the N. the rivers are frozen and snow covers the ground for five or six months in the year. In the central regions winter lasts for three or four months. The mountainous tracts of the centre and N. have the most rigorous winters, with the temperature not infrequently descending nearly to the freezing point of mercury. In Swedish Lapland the summer lasts ordinarily somewhat less than sixty days from about the fourth week in June to the third week in August, when the ground is again covered with snow and ice. The amount of rain is much less than in Norway. It is heaviest in the regions immediately bordering upon the Cattegat, where an annual precipitation of 35 inches is not exceptional on the E. coast, on the other hand as at Kalmar the fall is in many parts reduced to about 13 inches, the average rainfall for the whole of Sweden being about 28 inches. August is the rainiest of the months. The prevailing winds are SW. and W.

Natural Products.—The soil is not generally fertile and but a very small area of land is fit for cultivation. In 1902 the area of land actually under cultivation was 8.7 per cent. of the total area while the forested tracts covered 50 per cent. Barley is cultivated as far N. as lat. 60°. Rye, hemp and potatoes are grown in lat. 66°. Oats ripen to lat. 63° 30', wheat and brassicae to be cultivated with advantage beyond lat. 62°. Fruit-trees are almost wholly limited to the region S. of lat. 62°. The cereal crops in the order of their yield are oats, rye, barley and wheat. Potatoes are very largely cultivated. The principal forest-trees are the pine, fir and birch which extend almost to the extreme N. of the country, the lime, elm, ash, willow and alder between lat. 61° and 63°. The oak which grows as far N. as lat. 61° and beech which extends to lat. 57°. Rearing of live-stock is an important branch of industry but the pastures, as a rule, are poor and the herds and cattle are small while the sheep yield an inferior wool. N. of lat. 64° the reindeer is virtually the only domestic animal. At the close of 1902 there were registered in Sweden 2,577,409 head of cattle, 1,195,689 sheep, 807,021 pigs, and 542,158 horses. Among wild animals are the bear (now scarce), the wolf, lynx, fox, marten, lemming, hare and squirrel. Among birds special mention may be made of the different forms of grouse and of the partridge. Fish are abundant on the coasts and in the lakes and rivers.

The mineral resources of Sweden are very great and mining has developed into one of the chief industries of the country. Iron ore is especially abundant and yields the finest metal. The deposits of Gällivare, in the N. are especially famous for both quantity and quality. The richest copper mines are at Falun, also is obtained at Annaberg and silver at Sala. Gold is produced only to a small extent. The other mineral products are silver, alum, manganese, mica, sulphate of iron, cobalt, and coal of inferior quality in Scania. The quantity of ore mined in 1903 was iron 3,617,539 tons, zinc 62,927 tons, copper 36,587 tons, silver and lead, 9792 tons, manganese, 2244 tons, and sulphur pyrites 7793 tons. The quantity of coal mined in 1903 was 320,390 tons. The total number of persons engaged in mining in 1903 was 30,731.

Transportation.—The means of communication are almost everywhere good, the natural highways adding very materially to this condition. In 1903 the length of railways in operation was 7831 miles. Regular steamboat communication is maintained during the ice-free months on several of the larger southern lakes and on the Trollhättan-Göta system of canals, which unites the Baltic and the Cattegat.

Industries.—Among the chief industries of Sweden apart from mining are lumbering and the manufacture of wood products, the smelting of iron and the production of steel, flour milling, sugar refining, distilling and brewing, cotton and wool weaving and the manufacture of paper and paper pulp, machinery, margarine, tobacco, etc. The leading exports are in order of their importance, mineral ores, grain and flour, metal goods and machinery, raw textile materials and yarn, textiles, groceries, live-stock, and animal food, hair, hides, and other animal products.

Government, People, etc.—Sweden is a constitutional monarchy. The parliament, or diet, consists of two chambers, both elected by the people. The members of the First Chamber are elected for a term of 9 years by the provincial representative bodies (Landstings), or in the case of a few of the principal cities, by the municipal corporations. The members of the Second Chamber are elected for a term of 3 years, about one-third by the towns and two-thirds by the rural districts. In the larger towns they are chosen by direct election, in the smaller towns and rural districts by direct or indirect election according to the will of the majority (direct election being the rule). The suffrage is greatly restricted by property income qualifications. Sweden has a thoroughly homogeneous population; the non-Swedish elements comprising only about 1 per cent. of the inhabitants. The Finns number about 29,000 and there are about 6000 Lapps. The Swedes constitute the most numerous branch of the Scandinavian peoples, the north arm branch of the Teutonic race. They are nearly all Lutherans and the Evangelical Lutheran church is the established religion. The number of Jews is about 3500. At the head of the educational institutions are the universities of Uppsala and Lund. There are hardly any illiterates in the country. The national army amounts on a peace footing to between 35,000 and 40,000 men and officers. The navy maintained for coast-defence, comprises about 10 armored vessels.

History.—The history of Sweden begins to emerge from obscurity about 1000 years ago, at the time when the Norse Vikings figure as the terror of Europe. It was long after this that the two Teutonic peoples who displaced the possession of the eastern half of the Scandinavian Peninsula—Swedes and Goths—were welded into one nation. Christianity did not completely gain the upper hand until the twelfth century. Soon after this we find the Swedes masters of Finland. In 1397 the so-called Union of Kalmar was brought about by Queen Margaret, daughter of Valdemar IV of Denmark, by which the crowns of the three Scandinavian kingdoms were to remain permanently united. In 1521 Gustavus Vasa headed a rising against the Danes, and in 1523 he became king of Sweden. Denmark retained possession of the southern part of the country. In 1529 Lutheranism was established as the state church. In 1561 Esthonia passed into the possession of Sweden. Early in the seventeenth century Sweden rose to the position of one of the great powers of Europe through the genius of Gustavus Adolphus, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa. After wresting Jægerskiöld and Kärnäs from Russia, and Lithuania from Poland, he became the successful champion of Protestantism in the Thirty Years war. The Peace of Westphalia, in the reign of his daughter Christina, assigned to Sweden part of Pomerania, Wismar, the seat of Bremen and Verden etc. the sovereignty of Sweden being admitted to representation in the Germanic body. Soon after in 1658, Denmark was forced to relinquish her possessions in the Swedish part of the Scandinavian Peninsula. Sweden was mistress of the Baltic. Through the victories of Charles XII at the beginning of the eighteenth century Sweden again against whom Russia, Poland and Denmark had united brilliantly asserted her position as the great power of the North. Yet Charles' career of conquest was brief. While he was fighting Poland Peter the Great was establishing his dominion on the shores of the Baltic and the disaster at Poltava in 1709 marked the sudden collapse of the Swedish power. Livonia and Esthonia became Russian possessions, and to these Ingria and Karelina were soon added. In 1720 Sweden had to cede part of Pomerania to Prussia. In 1700 Russia conquered Finland. In 1813 Denmark was forced to cede Norway to Sweden receiving in exchange the small Swedish territory in Pomerania. The Congress of Vienna (1814-15) confirmed the king of Sweden in the possession of Norway (which had resisted the union) and recognized Russia's title to Finland. In the course of the Napoleonic wars all the German possessions of Sweden had passed out of her hands. The crown of Sweden and Norway remained united for 80 years, Norway retaining her national parliament and being governed by her own laws. In 1905 Norway dissolved the union in a revolutionary way.

There are 3 cities with a population exceeding 100,000. Zürich, Basel, and Geneva.

Relief of the Land—Physiographically Switzerland is broadly marked out into 3 well defined areas which follow one another mostly and in SW and NE trends. These are the Jura Mountains on the SW and NW, the great mountain masses of the complex Alpine system in the centre and S, and the so-called Swiss Plateau or plain that lies between these two at general elevations of from 1000 to 3000 feet, and extends from Lake Geneva on the SW to the Lake of Constance on the NE. A further geological classification divides the Alpine system into a northerly or limestone division with many prominent minor elevations and the more southerly division of the crystalline series, containing the giants of the Bernese Oberland and of the Pennine and Lepontine Alps, and comprising nearly the entire mass of central and southern Switzerland. Considerably more than one-half of the area of the federation is occupied by the Alps whose outer ramifications extend far into France, Italy, Austria-Hungary and Bavaria. For the general characters of these mountains (their higher summits, glaciers, passes, etc.), which are indeed those of the major part of Switzerland itself see the article Alps. The loftiest summit of all Switzerland is Monte Rosa (Dufour-Spitze) standing a short distance off from the boundary-line of the canton of Valais and Piedmont, 15,215 ft. high. Other lofty summits are the Mottmurn (14,780 ft.), Finsteraarhorn (14,025 ft.), Wenghorn (14,864 ft.), Breithorn (13,855 ft.), Döna, Jungfrau (13,660 ft.), Mönch, Piger, Piz Bernina (13,295 ft.), Schreckhorn (13,345 ft.), Wetterhorn (12,150 ft.), Blümlisalp (11,040 ft.), etc. Mont Blanc (15,822 ft.) which forms such a striking object as seen from many parts of Switzerland, lies wholly without the Swiss domain (in France and Italy). Among the more notable semi-detached mountain-systems or summits are those of the Stockhorn WFW of the lake of Thun (13,185 ft.), Niesen (S. of Lake Thun), Pilatus and Rigi (both on the Lake of Lucerne and respectively 6985 ft. and 5905 ft. in height) and Fanthorn N. of Grindelwald. One of the most striking features of the Alpine mass of Switzerland is constituted by the deeply incised double valley which forms the basin of the upper Rhone and the upper Rhine.

and which in a nearly rectilinear trend traverses the land from SW to NE. The central point of departure of these two long valleys is approximately the Furka Mountain (or Seddlo), with a height of 7990 ft., across which is carried the Furka Military road, the highest wagon road of Switzerland. Another deeply-incised valley having a trend nearly parallel with that of the Rhine (Vorder Rhein) is the Engadine (Upper and Lower), or valley of the Inn. The highest points of the Jura Mountains in Switzerland are the Dôle and Mont Tendre (5593 ft.). All the mountains of Switzerland exceeding 8500-9000 ft. in height are covered during the whole or the greater part of the year with snow and the perpetual snow-caps which give origin to hundreds of glaciers, seem to be on some of the ramitas (Jungfrau, Piz Bernina) not less than 300-350 ft. in thickness. The largest continuous névés or glaciers are those that cover the giants of the Bernese Oberland and the Monte Rosa-Matterhorn groups of mountains. Among the glaciers descending from these Arcturae the Aletsch (about 13 miles in length the largest in the Alps), Gornar Rhona, and Grindelwald (Upper and Lower). The most famous of the Alpine passes that he partly in Switzerland are, beginning at the west, the Great St. Bernard (height, 8115 ft.), Simplon St. Gotthard San Bernardino, Splügen and Boratna (7315 ft.). The St. Gotthard and Simplon mountain passes are now hured with railway tunnels and most of the diligence service over the mountains has ceased.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers of Switzerland are numerous, but they are serviceable for navigation only where their courses traverse or expand into lakes. The drainage of the land is effected by the Rhine to the North Sea, by the Rhone to the Mediterranean by the Tisone to the Po and the Adriatic, and by the Inn to the Danube and Black Sea. The Rhone traverses Lake Geneva (or Lemman) the Rhoda, Lake Constance the Linth Lake Zürich the Reuss Lake Lucerne the Aar takes Thun and Brienz and the Thule (Zühl) rising at the Orbe, lakes Neuchâtel and Biemme. Other streams not already named are the Thur Emmo (limit as the outflow from Lake Zürich is called) and Simme. No country in Europe except Scandinavia has in proportion to its size so many lakes as Switzerland. Those of the Alpine regions, famed for their magnificent scenery occupy the lower parts of the valleys. They are situated mostly at elevations of from 1200 to upward of 1500 ft. above the sea, the chief of these are the lakes of Geneva (the largest of the Swiss lakes with an area of 224 sq. m. elevation 1220 ft.) Brienz, Thun (1840 ft.) Lucerne (1435 ft.) Zug Wallensee, Zürich (1340 ft.) Constance (area, 30 sq. m.) and on the N. of the Alps Lago di Lugano (909 ft.) and Lago Maggiore (635 ft.). Most of these are traversed by steamboats. The tobieland contains the lakes of Morat, Seppach, Baldegger, Hallwyl, Greifensee and Pfäfers. In the Jura are the lakes of Neuchâtel and Biemme. Many of the Swiss lakes, perhaps even the largest and deepest, owe their origin to glacial scour and excavation others are distinctly the result of damming by moraine or other material. Lake Geneva has a depth of 1093 ft. Lake Zürich, 1340 ft. Constance, 1305 ft. and Lucerne, only 700 ft.

Climate Vegetation Agriculture etc.—The climate of Switzerland is largely influenced by the general situation of the land and by the presence of mountain bulwarks as a check to the free flow of winds. A diminished temperature and an abnormal fall of rain in most regions render it not particularly favorable to agriculture. It is on the whole salubrious, and above elevations of 3000 to 5000 feet or even less the atmosphere is singularly pure and free from mists or his germs and dust. On the plateau or middle section of the country the average January temperature varies between about 32° and 36° and the July temperature between 65° and 62° at St. Beatenberg, at an elevation of 3775 ft. the mean summer temperature is reduced to 57° and on the Rigi-Bühl 5905 ft. to 48°. The average fall of temperature is about 1° for every 300-350 ft. of ascent. Extremes of summer heat or winter cold are of rare occurrence, and while there is a heavier and more frequent fall of snow in the mountainous tracts than perhaps in any other country of Europe, the larger lakes are only exceptionally frozen over and spring weather frequently comes in with the early or middle days of February. The average annual rainfall varies greatly according to location. The number of rainy days in the mountainous tracts is unusually high and particularly annoying to the traveller or sight-seer. The annual precipitation ranges in many parts from 60 to 90 inches, depending upon elevation, the trend of the mountain ridges, etc. At Geneva, on the other hand, the fall is hardly 33 inches, and in sections of the canton of Valais it may be very much less (20 inches). Of the winds characteristic of the country may be mentioned the Föhn or Swiss wind, a dry, hot wind, which descends with impetuosity over the southern slopes of the Alps, and is frequently a precursor of heavy storms, and the Eise, a local wind of western Switzerland, which sweeps southward over the crests of the Jura Mountains and depresses the temperature by many degrees.

In its climate and floral aspects Switzerland is frequently divided into three zones 1 the basal or hill zone, comprised between about 1000 and 2500 feet elevation, a region of generally mild temperature, in which the chestnut and walnut flourish luxuriantly and to which belong border tracts of the principal lakes 2 the mountainous or middle zone, between 2500 ft. and 4000 ft., where the coniferous trees are largely added to those of the ordinary deciduous type and in which are located many of the more noted health resorts and 3 the upper or Alpine zone, between 4000 ft. and about 7000 ft. which marks the virtual disappearance of trees and the appearance of the upland meadows and pastures, frequently decked with a luxuriant growth of flowering plants (gentian, Alpine rose, heath blue-bell anemone, etc.) In this zone, to which succeeds, after a brief interval the region of perpetual snow, are situated the famous health and high mountain resorts of Davos (about 5160 ft.) the Rigi (Rigi Staffel, Rigi-Seelidach, Rigi Kuhn 5200-5900 ft.) Mürren (5490 ft.) Pontresina (5900 ft.) Silvaplana (5400 ft.), St. Moritz (6000 ft.) Salsp (7100 ft.) and Raxel Alp (7700 ft.). Of the total area of the federation it is estimated that somewhat over 70 per cent is productive, and of this amount about 35 per cent is under grass and meadow 29 per cent under forest, 15 per cent under fruit, and 16 per cent under crops and gardens. Rye, oats, and potatoes are the chief crops but the production is not sufficient to meet the demands of the people, and most of the produce is imported. The leading agricultural industries are the manufacture of cheese (Gruyère or Emmentaler, Neuchâtel, Simmenthal) and condensed milk (the exports of which reach nearly all the civilized countries of the globe). The preparation of milk chocolate has also become an important industry. The vine is largely cultivated in the lower sun-exposed tracts, between 800 and 1800 ft. and in low countries are the vineyards better cared for than in Switzerland. The fig and olive grow freely in the canyons which descend to the Italian plains.

The principal wealth of Switzerland consists in its rich and excellent pastures which in summer support vast numbers of cattle the finest breeds are those of the Emmentaler, Gruyère, Grayes, Zug and Schwyz. There were in Switzerland in 1901 1,340,375 cattle, 219,438 sheep and 354,634 goats. The silk worm is reared in the valleys of the Alps and also in some parts of the N. But little of the larger game of the land now remains. The chamois, once so abundant among the higher vales and crags, is but rarely seen and its very solution is determined by the enforcement of state law looking to its protection. The boar, goat or bearded vulture of the Alps, still inhabits the highest mountains. Fish of excellent quality abound in the lakes and rivers. Switzerland except for deposits of asphalt found in parts of the Jura Mountains (Val de Travers etc.) its salt and mineral springs, has little mineral wealth. Iron is found in the mountains generally but chiefly in the Jura, there are mines of lead and zinc in Grimsau. Turf is abundant in the marshy districts and coal is found in the table-land. The principal salt springs are at Bee in the valley of the Rhone. The country contains hundreds of mineral springs.

Manufactures.—Switzerland has made rapid progress in the manufacturing industry. There were in 1901 altogether 5089 factories, giving employment to 242,534 hands. The leading manufactures are those of textiles, leather, food stuffs, chemicals, wood-work, metals, machinery, paper, watches, jewelry, etc. Cotton goods are made chiefly in Appenzell and St. Gall. Silks are woven in Zürich and Basel and linen at Bern. Neuchâtel has superior printing establishments. Switzerland holds a notable position in the manufacture of watches, musical-boxes, embroideries and lace (St. Gall) and objects of carved wood. Beer is an important product (228 breweries in 1902) and the distilling of liquors and methylated spirits is a considerable industry.

Communication etc.—Switzerland is provided with splendid highways, the mountain roads especially being maintained in a rare degree of perfection. There were in 1902 2721 miles of railway in operation many of the railway lines, in their ascent of mountains and penetration through long mountain-tunnels exhibiting in their construction an amount of engineering skill which is perhaps presented in no other country. Numerous mountain railways of various styles of construction have opened up much of the higher and less accessible regions to the tourist. Among the most noted of these are the Rigi Pilatus Brienz-Rothhorn, Rochers de Naye, Gornar Grat (10,200 ft.), and Jungfrau railways, the last named projected to reach the summit of this magnificent mountain. A meteorological station has been established on Monte Rosa at a height of about 15,000 ft.

Education.—Switzerland has long been noted for the excellence of its educational institutions, both in the higher and the lower spheres of instruction, and its schools attract great numbers of foreign students. The number of private day-schools and penitentiaries is very large. The leading institutions of learning are the six universities of Bern, Geneva, Zürich, Lausanne, Basel, and Fribourg; the Polytechnic School of Zürich, and the academy of Vaud (Haut-Val) at Yverdon (the school age varying in the different cantons) is made obligatory by the state.

People, Language, Religion.—The Swiss nationality represents in great measure the admixture of the blood of the ancient Helvetians (a Celtic people) and of the Rhaetians (perhaps akin to the Etruscans) both of which peoples were more or less Romanized with the blood of the Germanic invaders of the Roman Empire. The German language is the dominant speech throughout the country except in the W (which is French) the extreme E (which is Italian and French) and the extreme S (which is largely Rhaetian). French is spoken by a majority of the people in the cantons of Fribourg, Vaud, Neuchâtel and Geneva. Italian is an Italian canton, and Italian prevails in part of Grisons. In Grisons the Rhaetian-speaking inhabitants comprise about two-fifths of the population being but slightly outnumbered by the Germans. The cantons in which the German element is numerically least important are Vaud and Geneva. According to the census of 1900 the Protestants numbered 1,916,157; the Roman Catholics, 1,379,664; the Jews, 12,284. The Protestants are in a majority in Aargau, Appenzell Outer Rhoden, Basel, Bern, Glarus, Grisons, Neuchâtel, Schaffhausen, Thurgau, Vaud, and Zürich predominating most largely in Appenzell Outer Rhoden, Bern, Neuchâtel and Vaud. The Catholics are in a majority in Appenzell Inner Rhoden, Fribourg, Geneva, Lucerne, St. Gall, Schwyz, Solothurn, Uri, Unterwalden Uri, Valais, and Zug. Appenzell Inner Rhoden, Lucerne, Schwyz, Uri, Unterwalden Uri, Valais, and Zug are almost wholly Catholic.

Government.—Switzerland is a confederation of little republics, each governed by its own constitution and laws. The legislative powers are vested in the Bundesversammlung (Federal Assembly) consisting of two houses, the Ständerat (Council of the States) and the Nationalrat (National Council). In the Ständerat the cantons as such are represented each by 2 members. The mode of choosing members of this body is left to the individual cantons and each canton is at liberty to determine the tenure of its representatives. The Nationalrat is a house of representatives elected by universal suffrage for a term of 3 years on the basis of 1 member to every 20,000 of the inhabitants. The executive power is vested in the Bundesrat (Federal Council). It consists of 7 members chosen by the Federal Assembly for a term of 3 years. The president of the Federal Council, who is president of the confederation, is chosen by the Federal Assembly and serves 1 year. He is not eligible for the succeeding year. The Federal Council is constituted as a cabinet of ministers, each member being at the head of a specific administrative department of the government. Bern is the capital of the confederation. The seat of the federal supreme court is Lausanne. In most of the cantons the legislative power is vested in a Grosser Rat (Great Council). A few of the smaller cantons dispense with a legislative body a primary assembly of all the voters (Landsgemeinde) being held. In each canton there is an executive council. A peculiar feature of the government in the Swiss cantons is the referendum or practice of submitting laws and measures to the voters for approval or rejection. The referendum is also a feature of the federal constitution. Coupled with the referendum is the initiative, the right of the people to draw up their own measures and have them submitted to the electorate by the legislature.

History.—At the dawn of history the Helvetians inhabited the western part of Switzerland and the Rhaetians dwell in the E. The Romans made themselves masters of the country in the first century B.C. The Roman domination lasted about four centuries. In the tide of German invasion which swept away the Western Roman Empire the Alemanni and Burgundians took possession of Switzerland. The Alemanni succumbed to the power of the Franks in 496 and the Burgundians in 534. Under the Franks a new civilization was introduced, established largely on a foundation of vigorous Christianity. After the dissolution of the great Frankish realm (close of the ninth century) the principal part of Switzerland was included in the duchy of Alamannia (Swabia), one of the great feudal states of the German kingdom, while the SW part belonged to the kingdom of Transjura Burgundy. Early in the eleventh century the dominions of the kingdom of Arles, the realm formed out of the two Burgundian kingdoms (Grisons and Transjura Burgundy) was taken possession of by the German emperor Conrad II and from this time the whole of Switzerland was included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. As part of this great labyrinthine fabric Switzerland embraced a medley of petty states ruled by dukes, counts, bishops, and abbots together with little city states, which expanded into cantonal commonwealths. In the thirteenth century the powerful house of Hapsburg over shadowed every other authority. In 1276 Rudolph of Hapsburg, who in 1273 had been elected German emperor brought the duchy of Austria (with Styria, etc.) under the sway of his house, whose power soon threatened the liberties of the Swiss. To resist its aggressions the three forest Cantons of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden in 1291 entered into a league which was the beginning of the Swiss Confederation. In the course of the fourteenth century Lucerne, Zürich, Glarus, Zug, and Bern were added to the league. The house of Hapsburg was unable to cope with the invincible mountaineers. At the close of the Middle Ages the connection of Switzerland with the German Empire came virtually to an end. The confederation was enlarged by fresh accessions, and the area subject to the Swiss was expanded in the early part of the sixteenth century by the acquisition of Italian districts and the conquest of the Pays de Vaud from Savoy by the Bernese. About this time Geneva shook off the authority of the dukes of Savoy as well as that of its bishops. The revolt against the Church was inaugurated in Switzerland almost simultaneously with the beginning of the Reformation in Germany. In the Peace of Westphalia (1648) Switzerland was formally declared independent of the German Empire. In 1798 the French occupied the country and established the Helvetic Republic. In 1803 Napoleon restored the cantonal confederation new cantons being added to the original ones. The Congress of Vienna in 1815 decreed the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland. In 1847 there was a civil war growing out of the efforts of the Protestants to expel the Jesuits, in which the Catholic cantons, united in a league called the Sonderbund, were vanquished by the federal forces.

Sydney, the capital of the British colony of New South Wales, the chief naval station of Australia, and next to Melbourne the most important commercial emporium of the British possessions in the southern seas is situated on the southern shores of Port Jackson 5 miles from the entrance of the harbor. Lat. of observatory 35° 61' 41" S. L. 151° 12' 23" E. It is the oldest city in Australia, having been founded in 1788 by Captain Arthur Phillip, who had been despatched by the imperial government to establish a penal settlement in this remote region. It occupies a site of rare beauty and picturesque. The harbor is quite landlocked, with deep water to the edge of its rocky shores and is defended by modern fortifications. Railway lines extend in several directions into the interior and there is direct steamship connection with nearly all the important ports of the Pacific and Indian oceans, as well as with many ports of the Atlantic and Mediterranean waters. The old part of the town which was originally known as Sydney Cove is fast disappearing, and it has given place to a handsome modern city with numerous public and private buildings, spacious gardens and promenades, and a general aspect not unlike that of the more attractive capitals of Europe. The centre of the lunar city is occupied by Hyde Park from which leading to the bay is Macquarie Street, with the government building, parliament house, mint, city library and other notable buildings and institutions. In virtual continuity with Hyde Park are the open which mingles with the extensive grounds of the botanical garden. Among the most prominent buildings or institutions of the city are the University of Sydney in Victoria Park which was founded in 1850 and has an attendance of about 750 students; the national art gallery Australian Museum; the Museum of Natural History; the metropolitan Cathedral of St. Andrew Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Mary land-office banking etc. Sydney is the seat of the government geological survey of the colony and among its scientific associations are the Royal Geographical Society of New South Wales, the Australian Anthropological Institute, and the Australasian Association for the Advancement of Science. The manufactures of the city comprise cars and locomotives, machinery foundry and smelting products, stoves, textiles, boots and shoes, clothing, tobacco, melted and distilled liquors etc. It is the outlet for a vast interior mining and pastoral region and its exports of wool, leather and gold are of great importance. Mean annual temperature, about 62° which is about the same as that of Lisbon. Mean temperature of January 71° of July 52°. Pop in 1871 134,747. In 1891 with the suburbs, 383,356. In 1901 488,382 of whom 111,801 belonged to Sydney proper and the remainder to the numerous suburbs (Belmore North Sydney Paddington, Redfern, Glebe, Woollebra etc.).
Sydney, or South Sydney, a town and port of entry of Nova Scotia, formerly capital of Cape Breton province, situated in the E. part of the island of Cape Breton at the Syrius (It. Syracusa ser-ra-ko-sa L. Syracusae Gr. Syrakousai, Syrakousai) a city of Italy on the E coast of the island of Sicily capital of the province of Syracuse 30 miles SSE of Catania. It stands on the little island of Ortygia, about 1 mile long and 1/2 mile wide connected by a mole with the main land. It covers but a small fraction of the site occupied by ancient Syracuse when it had risen to be a great city. The proud metropolis of the western Hellenic world, which at the height of its prosperity contained a population of hundreds of thousands, connected in addition to Ortygia, of 4 quarters—Aeschradia, Tyche Neapolis, and Epipolae. Its principal site was a rocky triangular plateau descending precipitously to the sea, and tapering in width as it receded from the coast until it came to a point in the extreme W where stood the great fort of Euryalus. The bay called Porto Grande, between Syracuse and the main land to the W shut in by Ortygia and the promontory of Plemmyrium (now Mazzoli) overstates one of the finest harbors on the coast of Sicily deep enough for the largest vessels. On the N side of the island is the small shallow harbor called Porto Piccolo. In the S. the island terminates in a spit of land on which stands a medieval castle. Syracuse is an unpretentious town, with narrow crooked streets, which are lighted by electricity. It carries on an active trade in wine, oil, and fruits. It possesses a curious architectural monument in its cathedral, which was built about an ancient Doric temple, whose numerous lofty columns form part of the edifice. Among other objects of interest within the city are the building known as the temple of Diana, the famous fountain of Arethusa (whose waters were rendered salt by an earthquake) and some of the old palaces. There is a fine archaeological museum, housed in a handsome new building.

On the main-land are to be seen various ruins of the classical Syracuse, scanty memorials of the greatness of the city. They include remains of walls and aqueducts, of the fort of Soryalus of a vast Greek theatre, hewn out of the rock, and of a Roman amphitheatre, the ruins of a huge structure supposed to have been the great altar of Hiero II and of a Roman building known as the house of Agathocles, and the septomis, immense quarries, which appear to have served as prisons and as burial places, now covered with luxuriant vegetation. Connected with one of these quarries is an artificial grotto known as the Ear of Dionysius, which exhibits remarkable acoustic phenomena. Striking monuments of the earliest Christian times are the catacombs. Among the remains of medieval Syracuse on the main land is the church of San Giovanni.

Syracuse was founded by the Corinthians in the latter part of the eighth century B.C. Its rise was rapid. It rose to be the dominant power in Sicily establishing its supremacy among the Greek cities of the island, and bidding defiance to the Carthaginians, who sought to bring Sicily under their sway. The Athenians undertook a disastrous expedition against it in 415-413 B.C. It was at the zenith of its greatness at the beginning of the fourth century B.C. under Dionysius the Elder. The Romans made themselves masters of the city in 212 B.C. Under the Romans it declined rapidly. Syracuse was a great centre of Greek culture. The most famous name connected with it is that of Archimedes, who was killed in the taking of the city by the Romans.

Syracuse, a city and port of delivery capital of Onondaga co. N Y, is situated on the New York Central and Hudson River the West Shore and the Lockport R. 148 miles W by N of Albany. It is at the southern end of Onondaga Lake, which is clothed by a broad boulevard and presents a pleasing aspect in its well-shaded streets. The Erie Canal traverses the centre of the city. Among the more noteworthy buildings and institutions of a public character are the Federal building town hall courthouse St. Paul's and St. John's cathedrals, Museum of Fine Arts (opened in 1897) state hospital for feeble-minded children county orphan asylum Holden Observatory and the various halls and college buildings of the Syracuse University (Crouse Memorial Hall Hall of Languages, Library, etc.) The university with faculties or colleges of liberal arts, fine arts, medicine, law and applied sciences has an attendance of about 2200 students. As an industrial centre Syracuse holds the fourth place among the cities of the state. One of its leading industries is the manufacture of salt from deposits which were discovered as early as 1664 on the shores of Onondaga Lake by Jesuit missionaries from France, and which have been chiefly worked until the present time by the state, to which they yield a considerable revenue. An allied industry the manufacture of soda-ash and kindred products gives employment to about 5000 hands. Other leading manufactures carried on here are those of type-writers, iron and steel tubing, foundry and machine-shop products automobiles, wagons, electrical apparatus and hardware specialties, mowers and reapers, ploughs, steam heating apparatus, novelties of many kinds, knitted goods malted liquors etc. The city's water-supply is obtained from Lake Skaneateles. In 1789 Asa Danforth established salt-works here, and a settlement grew up which was originally called Bogardus Corner and which changed its name several times. In 1825 the village was incorporated under the name of Syracuse. In 1847 the adjoining village of Salina was merged in Syracuse and the city was incorporated. Further annexations (Geddes, Onondaga) have been made since. Pop in 1860 28 110, in 1870 45 031 in 1880 51 792 in 1890, 58 143 in 1900 108 374.

Syr-Darya, sy-dar'ya, or Sikhon see Sikhon (anc. Jaxartes) a large river of Asiatic Russia, rises, as the Karya on the W slopes of the Kien-Shan in Sibirystobansk, flows westward through Fergana, and then NW through the territory of Syr Darya to the Sea of Aral, which it enters through a principal arm in about lat. 46° N. The major portion of its non-mountainous course is sluggish and the depth of water is not sufficient to secure important navigation. A former arm of the river now generally a dry bed, entered the Sea of Aral at its south eastern point.

Syr-Darya, a territory or province of Asiatic Russia, in Turkestan including most of the valley of the Syr-Darya, and bordering on the Sea of Aral Area, 194,653 sq. m. Capital Tashkent, in the extreme SE part. Pop. in 1897 1,479,848.

Syria, al-Sūriyā (Arab. al-Shām) a country in the SW part of Asia, forming part of the Turkish Empire. It extends eastward from the Mediterranean Sea to the river Euphrates and the Syrian Desert (the prolongation northward of the Arabian Desert) and southward from the Taurus (ancient Amanus) one of the ranges of the Taurus, to the frontiers of Egypt (Isthmus of Suez). It lies between the parallels of 31° and 37° N. lat. It comprises the vilayet of Syria (Suria), or of Damascus, the vilayet of Beirut, the SW part of the vilayet of Aleppo, and the mutesarriflik of Jerusalem and the Lebanon. Palestine is included in Syria, comprising the mutesarriflik of Jerusalem and part of the vilayets of Beirut and Syria. The designation Syria is sometimes used in a wider sense so as to include the whole of the vilayet of Aleppo and the vilayet of Zor, a large part of Mesopotamia being thus added. Syria, in the ordinary acceptance of the name, has an area in round numbers of about 75,000 sq. m.

The country embraces nearly the entire E. coast of the great eastern arm of the Mediterranean Sea. Syria, on the whole, is a region of great elevation, the highland belts (mountains and plateaus) extending in a N. and S. direction. Close to the Mediterranean shore along its middle reaches stretch the two lofty ranges of the Lebanon and Anti Lebanon with the narrow valley of Cole-Syria (El Baka a) between them. The Lebanon rises to a height of a little more than 10,000 feet, and the loftiest peak of the Anti Lebanon has an elevation exceeding 9000 ft. South of the ranges of the Lebanon are the highlands of Palestine, attaining an elevation of about 4000 ft. and the coast northward is skirted by mountains. Through Palestine, in an N. and S. direction extends a remarkable depression or trough through which the river Jordan descends, its waters accumulating in the Dead Sea, whose surface, about 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, is the most depressed portion of the earth's surface. The great plateau which stretches eastward from the mountain ranges dips down gradually towards the desert. Above it, about 50 miles to the SE. of the S. extremity of the Anti-Lebanon rises the detached mountain mass of Jebel-Hauran whose loftiest summit has an elevation of about 6000 ft. The peaks of the Lebanon are of limestone formation which gives to them their dazzling white appearance. Volcanic formations are present over large areas in Syria. To the E. of the upper Jordan is a vast stretch of lava-beds and Jebel Hauran bears numerous basaltic cones. The history of Syria records many destructive earthquakes.

A large proportion of the rivers of Syria lose themselves in the sands of the desert. The only river of any size in addition to the Jordan is the Nahr-el-Ar (anc. Orontes) which flows N. through Cole-Syria and beyond and bending abruptly westward enters the Mediterranean not far from Antioch (Antioch). The Litany (anc. Leontes) flows southward through Cole-Syria and empties near Tyre. The largest sheet of water in Syria is the Dead Sea. In its upper course the Jordan expands into lakes Huleh and Tiberiyyeh (Tiberias, Gennesaret, Gahlee). There are a few lakes in northern Syria in the vicinity of Antioch, Aleppo, and Hama.

There are many fruitful valleys in the Lebanon, while the activities themselves have in many places been increased and brought into a high state of cultivation. The valley of El Baka is a very fertile tract and the disintegrated volcanic material of the Hauran on the W. side of Jebel Hauran constitutes a rich grain-growing soil. Much of the soil of Palestine is naturally productive, artificial irrigation, however being largely necessary. The broad low-lying plain of Kadmool presents in the growing season a charming expanse of verdure. The surroundings of Damascus, rendered fruitful by the waters drawn from the river Barada, are one vast garden. The city of Aleppo is situated in the midst of a fertile plain. The Syrian plateau presents largely a barren aspect, and much of the country belongs to the desert. The chief feature of the climate of Syria is the long, hot, and rainless summer. Nearly the whole of the rainfall is in the six months from November to April. At Beirut, on the coast, the annual precipitation is as high as 56 inches, in Jerusalem it is about 23 inches. The regions to the E. of the mountains receive but little rain.

Throughout most of the country recourse is had to artificial irrigation. The plant-life of the Syrian coast-land belongs to the realm of the Mediterranean flora, among the characteristic forms being the olive, oleander mulberry, caryophyllus, date-palm and pistachio. The forest-growth on the W. slopes of the Lebanon includes dwarf oaks, pine, and cypress. Little remains of the cedars of Lebanon. Sub-tropical fruits of every kind are cultivated and fine wine is produced. The vegetation of the desert-region is characterized by the presence of aromatic and thorny plants. The fertile tracts of Syria produce large crops of cereals. Among other products in addition to fruits, are pease, cotton, tobacco, indigo, and rice. The rearing of the silk worm is extensively carried on. The most prominent of the domestic animals are sheep (including many fat-tailed ones) and goats. The camel is used extensively in the parts bordering on the desert. Among wild beasts of prey is the panther. Jackals are numerous. There are venomous serpents of various species, as well as scorpions, and swarms of locusts often descend upon the crops.

The manufacturing industries of Syria are but little developed, the bulk of the people being engaged in rural pursuits, trade, and transportation. In the large towns, however, there are many handicraftsmen whose skill is displayed in the quality of the silk stuffs, metallic wares, leather goods, gold and silver thread, and other articles which they produce. Among the leading exports are grain, silk, sesame, olives and olive-oil, wool and spangles. The principal seaport of Syria is Beirut, the port of Damascus, with which it is connected by rail. Southern Syria is traversed from N. to S. by the railway line which is in course of construction from Damascus to Mecca. Jerusalem is connected by rail with Jaffa, its port, and there is a railway line extending from the seaport of Haifa to the Jordan valley. The largest cities of Syria are Damascus, Aleppo and Beirut.

The inhabitants of Syria number about 2,500,000. They consist of descendants of the ancient Syrians (Arameans) whose speech is Arabic. Arabs, sedentary and nomadic, Turks, Jews, Franks, Greeks and Armenians. The great bulk of the people are Mohammedans. The Christians belong to a great variety of sects. The schismatic Maronite sect of the Druses, who dwell in the Lebanon have distinguished themselves by their fierce hatred of their Christian neighbors, the Maronites. The Syrian tongue is now practically a dead language.

History.—At the close of the second millennium B.C. the Phoenicians who dwelt in the narrow coast land of Syria, were at the height of their power and prosperity. Tyre and Sidon being their leading city-states. About this time the Hebrew kingdom makes its appearance in history established in the regions conquered from the Canaanites. On the southern part of the coast-land were the cities of the Philistines. From about the middle of the tenth century B.C. there were two Hebrew kingdoms, Israel and Judah. In the ninth century B.C. the Aramean kingdom of Damascus was at the height of its power. The Assyrian kings pushed their conquests into Syria. The Phoenician cities were forced to pay them tribute. The Philistines were made subject to the kingdoms of Damascus and Israel were extinguished by them. The country was known to the Greeks as Assyria the name being contracted to Syria. From the dominion of Assyria Syria passed under that of Babylon. The kingdom of Judah was destroyed by the Babylonians about 586 B.C. In the second half of the sixth century B.C. the sway of Babylon was succeeded by that of Persia. Two centuries later Syria became part of the Asiatic empire of Alexander of Macedonia. The most extensive of the kingdoms which arose as fragments of the great Macedonian realm that of the Seleucids, bore the name of kingdom of Syria, although Syria constituted but a small part of its vast area. Antioch the capital of the Seleucid monarchs, rose to be a splendid city and a great center of Greek culture. In 196 B.C. the Romans wrested the greater part of Asia Minor from the Syrian monarchy. Before the middle of that century the Jews threw off the Syrian yoke. In 64 B.C. Syria became a Roman possession and in the following year Judea was made tributary to Rome. In the third century A.D. Palmyra was the capital of a splendid realm. On the division of the Roman Empire in the fourth century Syria became part of the Byzantine Empire. In the first half of the seventh century it was conquered by the Saracens (Arabs). Damascus was the capital of the Umayyad caliphs. In the latter part of the eleventh century the country fell into the hands of the Seljuks. It was in order to wrest the Holy Land from these Turkish invaders that the Crusades were set on foot. The Christian kingdom of Jerusalem was founded in 1099. The Crusaders took the cities along the coast, and Antioch was the seat of a Chris-than principality. In the latter part of the twelfth century Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, conquered Syria and extinguished the kingdom of Jerusalem. Since 1510 Syria has formed part of the empire of the Ottoman Turks.

Tabasco, a state of Mexico, bounded on the N by the Gulf of Mexico, E by Campeche and Guatemala, S by Chiapas, and W by Vera Cruz. Area, 19,073 sq m. The surface consists almost entirely of a great flat, sloping gradually to the sea, but in many parts as low as to be subject to inundations which often isolate its villages and leave no means of communication except by canoe. Only along the southern border is there a line of mountain elevations. The streams, though numerous, are short and shallow and generally obstructed at their mouths by bars and flats. The more important are the Usumacinta and Tabasco (lower course of the Grigalva) which converge and have a common outlet, the Chiltapa, Chiltapilla, Gonzalez, Blancilla, and Tenochapa, the last-named forming part of the boundary between Tabasco and Vera Cruz. The climate is excessively hot and unhealthy. A large portion of the state is still covered with forest. The soil is very fertile and produces maize, excellent sugar-cane, coffee, cacao, vanilla, rice, and various tropical fruits. The inhabitants are chiefly Indians. It extends in a NNW and SSE direction between lat. 5° 30' and 6° 45' S, and has a length of about 400 miles. Its general width varies from 20 to 40 miles. Elevation of the surface, as determined by Lamore, about 2580 feet (2756 ft. according to Stanley) Greatest depth about 3125 ft. Lake Tanganyika occupies a narrow trough in the Great Rift Valley of Africa, with the shore-line in places clearly defined by abrupt cliff escarpments. It receives the Ruvu the overflow from Lake Kivu, in the N and discharges through the Luhaga, on the W, into the Tana lake, or main water of the upper Congo. The surface undergoes marked fluctuations of level. The waters are fresh and yet contain certain marine faunal types, which has given origin to the view that the lake may be the relict of a vast interior water (Congo Sea), which was formerly a direct continuation of the Atlantic Ocean. Lake Tanganyika was discovered by Burton and Speke in 1858 and was subsequently explored by Livingstone, Stanley and other travelers. The chief settlements on its shores are Usumbara (in the N) Ujiji (E) Bismarckburg (S) and Albertville (W). It is navigated by steamboats.

Lat. 35° 47' N. lon. 5° 48' W. It stands on a height near a spacious bay and, rising in the form of an amphitheatre, presents a very striking appearance when approached from the sea. It is surrounded by walls, with gateways, and has a crumbling castle or citadel (Kasbe) crowning one of the dominating heights. Tangier is a city of peculiar aspect consisting mainly of houses of one story built along lanes or narrow streets, too steep to permit of the use of vehicles. Almost the only exceptions to the general primitiveness of the buildings are furnished by the residences of the European consuls and ministers and those of a few wealthy merchants and the modern hotels that have recently been constructed. There are several mosques and Jewish synagogues and a Roman Catholic church and convent. Near the centre of the city which is illumined with the electric light, is the Little Mok (Sokko) or market, and outside of the walls the Large Mok where caravans frequently arrive with merchandise from the Sahara Desert and the Sudan. The harbor which was formerly very much frequented by vessels from almost all maritime countries, is now neglected. Most of the commerce which is very limited is confined to Gibraltar and the Spanish coast the internal traffic is chiefly with Tetuan and Fez. The trade is mainly in hides, wax, wool, grain leeches, fruit (especially the date) cattle, poultry etc. woollens, brass trays and metalware are manufactured, and much of the famous Moroccan leathers. Tangier is also an emporium for the sale of Rabat and other Moroccan carpets and the real furs obtained from Fez. Tangier (Tingis) was under the Romans the capital of Mauretania Tingitana. It was taken by the Portuguese in 1471 and transferred in 1662 to England as part of the dowry of Catharine of Braganza. The British kept possession of it for 22 years. The old town, narrow and cramped, and rich in Roman remains, lies on the slope of a steep eminence crowned by the mediæval cathedral and the archiepiscopal palace. On three sides the city is still enclosed by gigantic (cyclopean) walls. The ancient remains include, besides countless Roman inscriptions, the ruins of a circus, an aqueduct, and the Torreón de Pilatos, a prison supposedly dating from the time of Augustus. On the remains of some of the old walls runs the Paseo de Santa Clara, a promenade commanding beautiful views of sea and land. The cathedral, dating from the end of the twelfth century, is an exquisite product of the late Romanesque-Transition style. It has a handsome W facade, an imposing interior and cloisters which are among the most beautiful in Spain. Other noteworthy features of the town are the archiepiscopal palace, the Chiesa Provincial de Beneficencia, with an attractive garden, and the Chia Consistorial containing the Provincial Museum of Archeology. The city has on art academy, several seminaries, a library and a school of architecture. The industries of Tarragona include the manufacture of silk, paper and alcohol and the melting of ash. The railway connecting Adana with Mersina passes the town. It is a very unpretentious-looking place, with nothing to remind one of the celebrated Tartus of antiquity. Its population is probably not far from 15,000 and is a strange medley of peoples from different parts of the East. Among the industries is cotton-cleaning. The town is surrounded by delightful orchards and gardens. Tartus was the chief city of ancient Cilicia. It flourished under the Romans and was famous for its burning. It is noted as the birthplace of the apostle Paul. It was still an important place in the Middle Ages. Many relics of ancient Tartus have been brought to light in and about the town.

Tartary, a name which formerly in the widest acceptation of the designation was applied to the middle portion of the Eurasian continent, extending from the shores of the Pacific Ocean to the river Danube and thus comprising Manchuria, Mongolia, Dzungaria, Turkestan part of Siberia, and a considerable portion of Russia. Later when the application of the name had become greatly restricted the designations Little Tartary (European Tartary) and Great Tartary (Asiatic Tartary) came into use. European Tartary when it had been reduced to the dominions over which the khans of the Crimea held sway (the Crimea and an extensive region about the rivers Danube and Dnieper) came to be known as Crime Tartary. The name Tartary as designating a region of Asia, became finally a designation for the khans of Turkistan taken collectively the name Independent Tartary being used as synonymous with Turkistan. The use of the name Tartary is now antiquated.

Tasmania, tas-mā-ni-ā, formerly Van Diemen's

(das-mē-ni) Land, an island and British colony of the South Pacific Ocean off the southernmost point of Australia, from which it is separated by Bass Strait, about 150 miles wide. It is comprised between lat. $40^{\circ} 40'$ and $43^{\circ} 34'$ S and lon. $144^{\circ} 40'$ and $149^{\circ} 20'$ E. Area, 28,215 sq m. The major part of Tasmania consists of a central plateau or highland, having a general elevation of 3000 feet or more, and bearing on its summit a number of exceedingly picturesque lakes (Great Lake 12 miles long, 3000 ft. above the sea).

Rising above this plateau of ancient construction and continuing almost to the W coast, are several short mountain ridges or isolated summits to part of igneous origin which give the surface a broken aspect. The highest of these elevations is Mount Cradock, 5076 ft. which is the culminating point of the island. A scarcely less lofty range or series of heights follows the direction of the E. coast, and of this system Bee Lomond about 5000 ft. in height, is the leftmost summit. Other prominent summits in the island are Krenoburns Cap 4756 ft. Mount Barrow 4644 ft.

Ironstone Mountain 4796 ft. Mount Field West, 4731 ft.

Mount Hügel 4100 ft. Mount William 4346 ft. Mount

Olympus Mount Victoria, 1964 ft. and Mount Wellington, overlooking Hobart 4166 ft. The chief rivers are in the

S. the Derwent (about 130 miles long) and its branches

the Huon (about 100 miles in length) and, on the N the Tamar properly an estuary formed by the union of the Macquarie and the (South) Esk. A number of minor streams (Arthur Pieman Gordon) discharge on the W coast. The chief harbors or larger inlets of the coast are

Storm Bay leading to Hobart D Entrance Channel, leading to the estuary of the Huon Port Davey and Bath

Harbor in the SW Macquarie Harbor in the W, Port

Darbyshire and Kingborough Bay in the N and Oyster

Bay in the E.

The island was at one time almost entirely covered with forest and much woodland still remains. The vegetation is essentially of the Australian type with a marked development of the eucalyptus or blue gum some of whose individuals are said to attain the prodigious height of 350 feet and more. The valuable Ilion pine is still abundant in the

S. The principal agricultural crops are oats (yield of 1,600 000 bushels in 1904) wheat, potatoes, and hay. Hops are extensively grown while fruit culture has developed into an important industry. The native Tasmanian fauna, like the flora, is of the Australian type, with the marsupials and monotremes as the distinctive mammalian forms. Two characteristic marsupials the so-called Tasmanian tiger or wolf exhibiting a remarkable case of convergent modification and the Tasmanian devil are peculiar to the island

as well as a number of birds. Tasmanus absters with Australis in the possession of the duck bill (or ornithorhynchus).

The mineral wealth of the island comprises deposits of gold (reef and placer) tin (mined in the Mount Bleasby region in the NW and at Dransholme in the NE), silver (Zeehan

Dundas) copper (Mount Lyell) lead antimony, molyb-(Dundas, Hecleswood) and coal (Fingal Mount Nicolas etc. output in 1903, 51,805 tons). The copper and silver output in 1903 was valued at about $4,300,000.

The climate is salubrious and delightful, the mildest and most equable in all Australasia, and very much like that of the south of England. The mean winter temperature of the coast is 41° - 45° and the summer mean 63° . A maximum temperature of 116° - 118° has been registered at

Hobart. At Port Arthur in Tasmania's Peninsula, lat 45°

$14'$ S the mean temperature of the year is 56° , of the coldest month, 43° , of the warmest, 62° mean annual temperature of the whole island about 53° . The average annual rainfall in the island is about 31 inches. The live-stock numbered as follows in 1903: horses, 35,341; cattle, 188,938; pigs, 55,538; and sheep and lambs, 1,397,053. The wool-clip in 1903 was estimated at 9,200,000 pounds. The whaling trade is a branch of industry which at one time yielded to the colony a large revenue. The length of railway operated in 1903 was 630 miles, with a main line connecting Hobart with Launceston. In common with the adjacent colonies, Tasmania enjoys self government. The governor is appointed by the crown. The legislature consists of two houses, the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly, the members of the former serving for 6 years and those of the latter for 3 years. The island was discovered by Tasman in 1642 and named Van Diemen's Land in honor of the Dutch governor of the East Indies. It was afterwards partly explored by Cook in 1769. The first penal settlement formed there was in 1804, but in 1853 penal transportation having been abolished, the name of the colony was changed to Tasmania. On Jan 1, 1891 Tasmania became one of the states of the commonwealth of Australia.

Pop in 1901 172,475. Capital Hobart. The aboriginal inhabitants of the island, the Tasmanians of ethnologists, are entirely extinct.

Taurum, the earliest name of Taurus.

Taurus, a mountain-chain of Asiatic Turkey forming the great southern barrier to the Asiatic plateau and extending with many breaks, from near the Euphrates on the E. in a WSW and W. direction to the extremity of the Anatolian Peninsula. For the greater part of this distance it follows closely the Mediterranean border, falling steeply to the S. and in more gentle contours to the N. The islands of Rhodes, Scarpaeo and Crete appear to be an orographic continuation of these mountains. Different sections of this lofty range have received different names, as the Ala-Dagh Bulgar (Bolgur) Dagh and the Aet-Taurus, the last-named properly a diverging stem beginning with the river or gorge of the Sibus and having associated with it the volcanic Arghish Dagh (Mount Argus) the loftiest mountain in Asia Minor 15,900 feet high. Northward of the Bay of Llandelion the Jiben gorge separates the Taurian mountains from the mountains of Syria, which appear to continue in a rhomboid towards the Euphrates. The Armenian mountains lying E. of the Euphrates seem also to be orographically related to the mountains on the W. The loftiest summits of the central Taurus are seemingly the Alder (Punc-e-pitas) N. N. of Mervan 11,680 ft. and the Metdous (Mithras) lying a little to the eastward (in the Bulgar Dagh) 11,000 ft. The snow line is found on the N. side at about 9500 ft. and on the S. at 10,500 ft. The great uplift of the Taurus Mountains was effected in the Tertiary period of geological time.

Tehrān, tā-her-an or Tehran, tā-her-an, the capital of Persia, 70 miles S. of the Caspian Sea and 210 miles N. of Isfahan. Lat. 35° 45' N lon. 51° 25' E. It is situated on a plateau nearly 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, near the foot of one of the highest peaks of the snow-capped Elburz Mountains. The plain around the city has been converted through artificial irrigation into a smiling garden. Tehran is surrounded by a wall of modern construction and a moat, and is entered by about a dozen gates. The city presents the appearance of a great, ill-built oriental town passing through the process of modernization. It exhibits an endless array of low dwellings built of mud, numerous houses of the wealthier classes whose plain exteriors give no indication of the luxury that reigns within, mosques, bazars, caravansaries, and narrow, unpaved streets, and by the side of this modern boulevards illuminated with gas and traversed by tramways. Many of the better houses have courts within which are beautiful gardens and basins fed by pure water brought from a distance. The interior apartments are often handsomely decorated. The principal object of interest in the city is the royal palace, with its gardens, kiosks, baths, splendid apartments, its marble throne, and its museum containing jewels and gems of priceless value. Among the institutions that reflect the transformation which the Persian capital is undergoing is King's College, a polytechnic institute in which a number of European professors are employed. The sanitary condition of Tehran has of late been greatly improved, but in the summer a residence in the city is almost unendurable and there is a great exodus of the well-to-do inhabitants to the inviting coolness in which are a number of fine royal chateaux and healing spas.

Tehrān is not very important as an industrial city. It is the centre of a considerable caravan trade and is connected with Reht by a modern highway. Near the city are the ruins of the ancient Rhages (Rei) the birthplace of Harun al Rashid. About 40 miles NE. of Tehran is the volcanic peak of Demavend towering to a height of about 18,000 feet. The city rose to importance only about 100 years ago, after the establishment of the Kajar dynasty in Persia. The population in winter is estimated at about 250,000 but in the summer the number of inhabitants is supposed to be diminished by about one-third. There are only a few hundred Europeans.

Teneriffe, tá-ná-rô-fé (Sp. Tenerife tá-ná-roo-fá) the largest of the Canary Islands, between Gran Canaria on the E and Gomera on the W. Lat from 28 to 28 35 N lon from 16° 45' to 16° 55' W. It is 60 miles long from NE. to SW. Area, 788 sq m. The island is wholly of volcanic formation is composed principally of enormous masses of trachyte, basalt, and comparatively recent lava, and in its culminating point, the Peak of Tenerife (Pico de Teide) attains an elevation of 12,200 feet. The coast presents an almost uninterrupted succession of lofty cliffs, pierced by narrow precipitous fissures or ravines, and very few openings in which a vessel can find shelter. The only good harbor now existing is that of Santa Cruz (Santa Cruz de Tenerife) on the NE. The Peak of Tenerife, which is the highest point rising out of the Atlantic basin, is geologically one of the most instructive of volcanic cones. Its lower slopes supporting extensive growths of chestnut, peach fig banana, lemon and orange, have numerous hamlets and villages scattered over them. A median zone is that of the oak pine, laurel various heaths and violets (the highest flowering plant) beyond which follows (above 10,000 ft.) the naked and craggy lava-desert or salpina, and then the fields of scorio and pumice. The view from the summit which has a crater a few hundred ft. in diameter and which carries a snow-cap ordinarily during the months from November to April, is one of the most magnificent in the world.

The principal products of Tenerife are maize, wheat, potatoes, pulse almonds, tropical fruits honey wax silk cochineal sugar and wine. The dragon tree, coconut and date-palm numerous cacti and euphorbia also flourish. The manufactures are very insignificant but include, in addition to some coarse linen woollen, and silk goods, some excellent specimens of furniture and cabinet-work. The Guanches the original inhabitants of the island almost all perished in vain endeavor to defend their freedom against the attacks of the Spaniards. The present inhabitants consist of a mixed race in which Spanish features predominate. Pop in 1900 138,008. Capital Santa Cruz de Tenerife. Other towns are Laguna, Orotava, on the NW coast (noted for a famous dragon tree) Guimar and Puerto de la Cruz Tennessee, a south-central state of the American Union bounded N by Kentucky and Virginia, E by North Carolina, S by Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and W by Arkansas and Missouri. The northern boundary eastward from the Tennessee River is approximately the parallel of 36° 30' N lat. westward of that river it is the parallel of 36° 30'. The northern boundary is the parallel of 36° 30' N lat. westward of that river it is the parallel of 36° 30'. The northern boundary is the parallel of 36° 30' N lat. westward of that river it is the parallel of 36° 30'.

The W boundary is formed by the Mississippi River. From North Carolina it is separated by the Iron Bald and Unaka or Great Smoky ridges of the Appalachian Mountains whose general altitude is 5000 feet and whose broad tops are generally treeless. Area of the land-surface, 41,550 sq m. of the surrounding waters 200 sq m.

Parts of the Country—Tennessee is popularly spoken of as consisting of three sections—East, Middle, and West Tennessee. The first consists of the eastern mountain border with numerous lofty summits. Clingman's Peak (or Dome) 6519 feet Mount Orynt 6636 ft. Mount Le Conte 6612 ft. Mount Love, 6443 ft. High Knob etc. (2) The beautiful East Tennessee Valley, which has an average elevation at the V of 1350 ft. and at the S of 800 ft. and is one of the most fertile and populous tracts in the state. This valley is slowly furrowed with minor ridges long valleys, and enclosed 'coves' nearly all with a NE and SW trend and the whole varying from about 30 to 50 miles in width. (3) The greater portion of the Cumberland Mountain plateau (elevation above the valley 900 to 2000 ft. or more) which on its southeastern border breaks down at once in perpendicular or overhanging redstone cliffs often of great height, while its western edge is notched and jagged with deep coves and projecting spurs. In the N it is 70 miles wide at the S extremity but 50 miles. Its top is generally level but at some points there are superimposed mountains and the deep Sequatchie Valley with its steep mountain walls, reaches into the plateau in a northward course. The plateau has a delightful climate, sloped in deep coves and conceals great mineral treasures. Middle Tennessee extends westward from the plateau region to the lower Tennessee River. It is a region of fertile terraces, traversed by many ravines and streams, and declining northwards and towards the garden of Tennessee a basin-like area of 5000 sq m. West Tennessee lies W of the Tennessee River and E of the Mississippi. Its eastern slope is considerably broken the western descent is a rolling plain which ultimately terminates in steep bluffs overlooking the Mississippi bottom lands. These are partially timbered and abounded in lakes and swamps.

Rivers—The Mississippi, Tennessee, and Cumberland afford extensive commercial facilities. The Tennessee including its head-streams, crosses the state twice. Its principal tributaries are the Clinch Holston (the confluence of these two generally considered to form the Tennessee) Hiwassee, Sequatchie, Elk and Duck. The Middle Tennessee and French Broad flow into the Holston. Among the tributaries of the Mississippi, direct and indirect, are the Big Hatchie, Wolf Forked Deer Ohio, and Reelfoot. Reelfoot Lake, in the NW is the largest lake in the state. It is a shallow expanse, formed during the earthquake of 1811. The principal effluents of the Tennessee have been made available for high water navigation to some extent. The chief tributaries of the Cumberland are the Harpeth Stone and Obie errors, and the Caney Fork. Both the Tennessee and the Cumberland are badly obstructed by shoals of low water. The minor streams of the state afford very great water power though in the mountainous parts their very rapid fall and their large and frequent fluctuations in volume render them unreliable for practical purposes.

Geology Musculi N orth—The eastern mountain-border consists mainly of Cambrian and Silurian rocks and of the underlying Ascle series. It affords asbestos, kaolin and beautiful red, green, and other granites. Valuable copper-mines are wrought in Polk co. in the extreme SE. and elsewhere and the foot-hills abound in iron ore, including rich pyrites, limonite, hematite, magnetite, and valuable iron manganese ores. The East Tennessee Valley which is geographically and geologically a continuation of the Kittatinny Valley of New Jersey the Cumberland Valley of Pennsylvania, and the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, is flanked by the Trenton limestone and Hudson River shales. The valley contains dysomite (a valuable fossiliferous brown hematite) hydraulic cement rock, good lithographic shale, heavy-rare millstone, slate, an abundance of potter's clay, limestone, fire-proof stone, native blue vitriol, marble, and ores of lead and zinc. The coal measures underlie an area of 5000 sq. m. mainly occupying the Cumberland Mountain plateau. The coal is mostly a semi-bituminous variety admirably adapted for iron-smelting. The product in 1903 was 4,798,044 short tons, valued at $5,979,830. Middle Tennessee contains a large Lower Silurian area in the floor of its great basin whose converging slopes and terraces are generally of Devonian and Silurian-Devonian age. Petroleum, alum, gypsum, grindstones, glass and marble, hot-guano (from caves), coppers, sculpin clay and iron are among the useful products of Middle Tennessee. Along the Tennessee River extends the western iron belt, covering over 5000 sq. m. with huge banks or quarries of brown hematite of a good quality. The state's product of iron-ore in 1903 was 481,510 tons of brown hematite and 31,189 tons of red hematite. The greater part of West Tennessee is of Cretaceous and Tertiary age, but the Mississippi bottoms are of Quaternary and late for malion. The Cretaceous and Tertiary contain lignite in abundance, and there are beds of valuable green and marl. Among the minerals of Tennessee must also be mentioned barytes, baraz, gypsum salts (from caves and spring waters) and salt from natural brines. Phosphate mining has developed into an important industry. The marbles are particularly varied in color and include purely white, perfectly black, red, green variegated, gray breccia, and natural agiolite. Mineral springs are exceedingly numerous and prove useful in a very wide range of diseases.

Climate.—The generally considerable elevation of Tennessee secures it from the oppressive summer heat of the Gulf states and the highland and mountain counties have a long and altogether delightful summer while the winters are nowhere severe. The only unhealthy region is the swampy part of West Tennessee. The average annual rain fall varies from about 42 to 52 inches being usually heaviest in the western sections.

Natural Productions.—The extensive forests of the state afford a very great variety of timber trees. In the E grow the white and other pines in the W the larch, cypress, and cottonwood and almost everywhere the tulip-tree, hickories, the magnolias sweet and black gum black and white walnut, cherry, peach, ash, maple, persimmon, sorrel-tree, locust, chestnut, beech, several kinds of oak etc. Middle Tennessee has great forests of red cedar. The lumber interest is one of the most important in the state and Tennessee ranks foremost among the Southern States of the Union in the value of its lumber products. In the W are extensive cane-brakes. Among the native fruits are the wild plum, the grape, persimmon, crab apple, pawpaw and many sorts of nuts and berries. Deer the black bear and many species of furred and feathered game abound. Among the reptiles the rattlesnake and cottonmouth are voracious.

Agriculture.—West Tennessee is extremely fertile, with a deep black mellow soil and Indian corn and cotton are its great staples. Middle Tennessee is mostly very productive, though some few of its counties have a rocky and untoward soil underlain with solid and stubborn clays. This region is for the most part excellent grain and tobacco land, and grows much cotton especially towards the E. The valley lands of East Tennessee yield fine crops of corn and tobacco, and the winter wheat of this section is of superior excellence. Potatoes, sweet potatoes, oats, hay, hemp, and peanuts are important products of the state. The mountain-country affords excellent and extensive natural sheep-walks, and the abundant meat of the forests fattens many swine. Horses, goat cattle, swine, and mules are bred for export. The leading agricultural crops in 1904 were corn 54,997,880 bushels, wheat, 11,626,068 bushels, oats, 5,810,108 bushels, barley 25,622 bushels, rye, 124,287 bushels; potatoes, 1,345,680 bushels and hay 313,423 tons. The orchard fruits, especially the apple, are extensively cultivated, and much attention is also given to the raising of berries and vegetables. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1904 was 1,002,800 pounds.

Manufactures.—The leading manufacturing industry of the state is flouring and grist-milling, whose chief seats are Nashville, Knoxville, and Memphis. The value of the product in 1904 was $21,798,828. The next most important industry is the manufacture of lumber and timber-products (tar, turpentine, charcoal, tanner's bark, etc.); the aggregate value of which was $18,127,784. The mining and smelting of iron and copper are assuming large proportions. The product of pig iron in 1900 was 362,190 tons and that of wrought iron and steel was considerable. The value of the iron and steel industry was reported at $6,080,024, that of the product from foundries and machine-shops, at $4,674,560. Zinc and zinc points are produced in East Tennessee. The cotton and woolen manufactures in the state employ extensive capital; the textile products in 1900 were valued at $3,067,270. Cars, carriages, furniture, spirits, leather, metallic wares, and wines are other articles of manufacture. Wool-carding and boat-building are industries of some consequence. There were in the state in 1900 about 130 manufactories of tobacco and cigars. The product was valued at $3,810,822.

The railroads in 1881 had a length of 112 miles in 1889 1263 miles in 1870 1492 miles in 1890 1823 miles; in 1896, 2708 miles and in 1900 3139 miles.

The counties are 95,—namely Anderson, Bedford, Benton, Blount, Blount, Bradley, Campbell, Cannon, Carroll, Carter, Cheatham, Chester, Claiborne, Clay, Cocke, Coffee, Crockett, Cumberland, Davidson, Decatur, Dekalb, Dickson, Dyer, Fayette, Fentress, Franklin, Gilmer, Giles, Grainger, Greene, Grundy, Hamilton, Hancock, Hardeman, Hardie, Hawkins, Haywood, Henderson, Henry, Hickman, Houston, Humphreys, Jackson, James, Jefferson, Johnson, Knox, Lake, Lauderdale, Lawrence, Lewis, Lincoln, Loudon, McMinn, McNairy, Macon, Madison, Marion, Marshall, Maury, Meigs, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Morgan, Obion, Overton, Perry, Polk, Putnam, Rhea, Roane, Robertson, Rutherford, Scott, Sevier, Shelby, Smith, Stewart, Sullivan, Sumner, Tipton, Trousdale, Union, Van Duren, Warren, Washington, Wayne, Weakley, White, Williamson, and Wilson.

The principal cities are Memphis, on the Mississippi, a great cotton mart (pop. in 1900 102,320); Nashville, the state capital, on the Cumberland (80,346); Knoxville (32,637); Chattanooga in the coal and iron district (30,154); Jackson (14,511); Clarksville (9431); Columbia (6032); Bristol, Cleveland, Dyersburg, Union City, Murfreesboro, Johnson City and Harrison.

Education.—The leading educational institutions are the University of Nashville, the University of Tennessee, at Knoxville, the Vanderbilt University (Methodist Episcopal South), at Nashville, the East Tennessee and the Roger Williams University both for colored, also at Nashville the University of the South (Presbyterian) at Greenville, the Cumberland University (Cumberland Presbyterian) at Lebanon; the U. S. Grant University at Chattanooga; Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville; American University at Harrison and Southwestern Baptist University at Jackson. Among the normal schools may be mentioned the Chattanooga Normal University, the Peabody Normal College at Nashville, the Le Moyne Normal Institute at Memphis, and the Southern Normal University at Huntingdon. There are several schools of law, medicine, and divinity, and a large number of private and denominational academies and seminaries.

Government, etc.—The governor and the members of the legislature (senators and representatives) are chosen for a term of 2 years. The state has 10 representatives in the lower house of the national Congress.

The population in 1790 was 35,091 in 1800 103,662 in 1810 281,727 in 1820 422,771 in 1830 681,964 in 1840 829,210 in 1850 1,002,117 in 1860 1,106,801 in 1870, 1,258,590 in 1880 1,542,359 in 1890 1,767,518 in 1900 2,029,816. The negro population in 1900 numbered 499,439. There were only 17,746 foreign born people in that year.

History.—The first white settlements in this region which was originally included within the limits of North Carolina, were made just before the beginning of the Revolutionary War. In 1764 the settlers organized the state of Franklin which existed only till 1776. North Carolina having ceded the region to the United States, Congress in 1790 passed an act for the organization of the Territory South of the Ohio. In 1796 the state of Tennessee was admitted into the Union. In June, 1801 a majority of the people voted for secession. A great majority of the inhabitants of East Tennessee declared their adhesion to the Union, but were prevented from taking action by the presence of the Confederate forces. Some of the most important engagements of the Civil War were fought in Tennessee,—the battles of Stone River (Murfreesboro) Chickamauga, Chattanooga, and Nashville. Tennessee has given three presidents to the United States—Jackson, Polk, and Johnson.

Texas, the largest state in the American Union and the southwesternmost of the Gulf states is bounded on the N and E by New Mexico and Oklahoma Indian Territory Arkansas and Louisiana, SE by the Gulf of Mexico SW by Mexico (from which it is separated by the Rio Grande) and W by New Mexico. Its northernmost limit is the parallel of 36° 30' N. lat. the most southerly point is about 100° W. eastward the Red River is the southern boundary. Area of the land surface, 362,594 sq. m. of the appertaining waters 3490 sq. m.

In a of the C. and G. y. -Texas may be divided topographically into a number of NF-SW belts which succeed one another normally westward or northward from the Gulf. The easternmost of these is a part of the great coastal plain of the United States which occupies a broad area and rises in its higher points to 600-700 feet. Beyond this follows an area of 600-1000 ft. elevation bordered on the W by the prominent escarpment of the slaked plain (Llano Estacado) a plateau varying from 1000 ft. elevation in the S to 4000-5000 ft. in the N. A considerable portion of the western half of the state belongs to the region of the Great Plains. South of New Mexico and the Texas River the country is mountainous. Here are the Organ Mountains, the Sierra del Alamo del Diablo, Blanca Aquila Monks, Guadalupe Apache, Lincot, Charro, etc. extending for the most part indefinitely and irregularly southward, interspersed with salt plains and table-lands where denser a region and frequent water holes alone prevent the country from being impassable. Some of these mountains probably have their orographic continuations in the N of Mexico. Among the highest elevations of the state are Baldy Peak 8382 ft. Black Mountain 7550 ft. Blue Mountain 7336 ft. Chinati Peak 7730 ft. and Sawtooth Mountain 7748 ft. Between the Sabine River (which forms the greater part of the boundary with Louisiana) and the Trinity there are extensive level and sandy pine forests, northward of which the country is rolling, well timbered, and fertile. Central Texas, as far W as the Colorado, is very generally prairie, with timber belts along the streams, but in the N there is an extensive forest, the "Cross-Timber," consisting mainly of post-oak and black jack, and southward is a region called the mesquite timber from the abundance of its mesquite trees. Western Texas is generally a dry pastoral region, with an invigorating climate, varied scenery and a generally ample supply of clear water in its streams, wells and springs; but northward there are tracts where the water is salt or in other cases is so charged with lime-salts as not to be potable. Along the Rio Grande the country is frequently barren and its growth of mesquite and post-oak is so small as to constitute no longer a forest, but a thicket or chaparral. The coast-lands of Texas are everywhere low and frequently sandy or marshy.

Rivers.—The rivers Sabine and Neches reach the sea through the Sabine Lakes and its Pass and both afford some navigation. The Angelina, an affluent of the Neches is also navigated in high water. Into Galveston Bay flow the Trinity River and Buffalo Bayou both navigable for steam boats. The Brazos has been navigated by steam for 300 miles, but at low water its channels are encumbered by shifting shoals. Matagorda Bay receives the Colorado, which has been rendered navigable to Austin. The Guadalupe, San Antonio, and Nueces afford but few commercial facilities. The Rio Grande in its lower course is a fairly large stream crooked and swift, with a bad bar at its mouth, but steam navigation is practicable at periods of high water for some distance upon it. Its principal tributary is the Pecos a long but slender stream. East of the 10th meridian Texas is for the most part well watered with either one stream, The Red River receives from Texas the Canadian, Pecos, Big Wichita, and Little Wichita rivers and the Sulphur Fork besides several upper forks and head streams. The chief elements of the Brazos are the Leon, Clear Fork and Navasota. Into the Colorado flow the Llano Concho San Saba, and Salt Fork. The San Marcos flows into the Guadalupe, the Medina into the San Antonio and the Rio Frio into the Nueces. The Red River and Big Cypress Bayou afford important steamboat navigation for the NE section.

The coast line is about 400 miles in extent. The low peninsula of Bolivar and Matagorda, and the sand islands of Galveston, San Luis, Matagorda, St. Joseph Mustang Padre and Inshore fence for fifty of the main coast-line from the waves of the gulf being separated from the main land by a series of bays and lagoons, of which the principal are at (Alvin) Trinity (San Luis Matagorda, Tres Palacios) Lavaca San Antonio Espiritu Santo, St. Charles Corpus Christi and the Laguna del Madre. Galveston is the seat of most of the maritime trade.

Geology.—Ancient and ancient Paleozoic rocks appear in the mountain ridges on the upper Rio Grande but the great formations of Texas are the Cretaceous and the Tertiary. A line running from the NE angle of the state on the Arkansas boundary line southwestward to Austin and thence to San Antonio and extending in the same general course to the Rio Grande, would roughly divide the Tertiary on the F from the Cretaceous on the W. On the sea-coast the Tertiary gives place to Quaternary and recent formations. The Permian and Jura-Grass together cover a large part of the remainder of Texas probably including a portion of the baked Plain. There is in the W a large exposure of the Carboniferous respectively in the upper valley of the Colorado. The main coal field underlies an area of perhaps 12,000 sq. in. Brown and black lignites of the Tertiary are also abundant. There are large and important deposits of iron (magnetite, etc.) copper and argenteiferous galena in the W and NW counties. Bismuth and other metals are also found. The output of coal in 1903 was 926,759 short tons, valued at $1,545,383. Salt springs and lakes are numerous in the NW and along the Gulf shore there are extensive and productive salt-lagoons. The production of salt in 1903 was 314,000 barrels. Petroleum has latterly been obtained in large quantities and the state stood in 1903 third in rank among the states of the Union as a producer of this substance—17,930,873 barrels, valued at $7,517,479. The greater part of the output is from the Bennett pool (discovered in 1901) and the Poor Lake area in Hardin co.

Climate.—The Gulf coast has a long and hot summer, tempered by sea breezes, and modified by occasional "norther" (as the cooler storm-winds are called) which sometimes last four or five days. The high inland prairies have a delightful climate throughout the year. W of the meridian of 100° W in the summers are too dry for agriculture, except where irrigation is practicable. As a whole, Texas is remarkably beautiful except that in the low grounds and moist prairies malarial fevers are apt to prevail. The coast-towns are exposed to visitations of fogs and along the Rio Grande the singular break-bone fever (or denagao) is endemic. The mean summer temperature at Galveston is about 84° and at El Paso, 81°. In the lower coast-region the temperature rarely descends to the freezing point, but in the western and northern highlands it may fall to zero, or even considerably lower. The average annual rainfall which is 50-80 inches in parts of the coast-strip, diminishes rapidly westward and at El Paso is only about 10 inches.

Flora and Fauna.—Among the native wild animals are the bear puma (rare) deer peccary civet, armadillo, racoon coyote, opossum etc. Many birds visit this state which are never seen elsewhere in the United States. The tarantula, scorpion, centipede, wood-tick, chigger, and locust are troublesome insect pests in some parts. Here are also found the interesting agricultural ants. Among the trees are the long and short-leaved pine cypress, live-and-post-oak blackjack pecan hickory mulberry plane, buckeye, walnut, bold arbo, and locust. The mesquite affords excellent fuel, besides gum tannin bark and edible pods and seeds. The Mustang grape and post-oak grape are among the excellent native fruits, and the former is thought to be of a species peculiar to Texas. Palm trees grow in the SW. In the W grow native species of ebony and lignum-vita, and there are many large and small species of cactus some of which when deprived of their spines, are fed to cattle and mules. A characteristic plant of the W is the yucca (or Euphorbia boyenii).

Agriculture.—On the coast sea-land cotton is grown. The deep alluvium of the river bottoms near the gulf is adapted to sugar-culture and is unexcelled for cotton. The prairies (both black and chocolate) are fine corn and cotton lands. In the SE rice does well and as a rule all the eastern and central sections are adapted to cotton and corn and to the raising of live-stock and fruits. Swine thrive upon the abundant mast of the timbered lands. Wheat of special excellence is grown in the N centre, and W but the general occupation westward is cattle-raising and wool growing. The broken and hilly country presents facilities for irrigation which is destined greatly to extend the area of cultivable land. Texas is the leading cotton-growing state of the Union and produced a commercial crop in 1894-1900 of 2,438,455 bales. The average under cotton in 1900 was 6,960,367. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were corn 81,962,910 bushels wheat 23,395,913 bushels oats 28,278,233 bushels barley 56,405 bushels rye 64,630 bushels potatoes 910,918 bushels and hay 548,849 tons. Orchard fruits are extensively cultivated. Wine is produced to a considerable extent. The European wine-grape does well in the NW and El Paso formerly was noted for its pleasant Pasa wine and brandies. Figs and oranges thrive in the southern parts. Texas takes a leading position among the states of the Union in the industry of stock raising which with agriculture, is its main pursuit. It far surpasses every other state in the number of its cattle (nearly 10,000,000 including spring calves, in 1900). The amount of washed and new-bleached wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1905 was 14,486,225 pounds.

Manufactures. are not yet extensively established. Carriages, wagons, bricks, flour, meat extracts, furniture, cast-iron, lumber, beer, cotton-seed oil, saddlery, harnesses, fine salt, and woolens are manufactured. The lumber and timber products, which constitute the most important item in the manufactured products of the state, were valued in 1900 at $17,801,779. Of second rank is the manufacture of cotton-seed oil and cake, the product of which was valued at $14,885,324. Associated with this industry is the ginning of cotton, the receipts from which in the same year amounted to $5,886,923. The flaring and gird-mill products were valued at $12,333,730. There were in the state in 1899 189 manufactories of cigars and tobacco, which turned out 13,301,494 cigars.

Railroad.—In 1854 there were 54 miles of railroad. In 1860 301 miles. In 1870 711 miles. In 1880 3244 miles. In 1899 6719 miles and in 1900 9669 miles.

Commerce.—These in 1900 numbered 243, as follows: Anderson Andrews Angelina, Aransas, Archer Armstrong Atascosa, Austin Bailey Bandera, Bastrop Baylor Bee, Bell Bexar Blanco, Borden Bosque Bowie, Brazoria, Brazos, Brewster Briscoe, Brown, Burleson Burnett, Caldwell Calhoun Callahan, Cameron Camp, Carson Cass Castro, Chambers, Cherokee, Childress, Clay Cochran Coke Coleman Collier, Collingsworth Colorado, Comal Comanche Concho, Cooke, Coryell Cottle Crane Crockett, Crosby Dallas Dallas, Dawson, Deaf Smith Delta, Dent Donnell, Dickens, Dimmitt, Donley Dural Eastland, Ector Edwards, Elgin, El Paso, Erath Falls, Fannin Fay, Felt, Fisher Floyd, Ford Fort Bend, Franklin Freestone, Frio Gaines, Galveston Garza, Gillespie Glasscock Goliad Gonzales, Gray Grayson Gregg Grimes, Grady, Hale, Hall, Hamlin, Hamford, Hardeman, Hardin, Har-

The chief cities and towns are San Antonio (pop. 53,321), Houston (44,433), Dallas (42,638), Galveston (37,789), Fort Worth (36,688), Austin (the capital, 22,256), Waco (26,486), El Paso (15,906), Laredo (13,479), and Danbury (11,807).

Education.—The richly endowed state university (University of Texas) is located at Austin and Galveston. Other collegiate institutions are the Fort Worth University, the Southwestern University at Georgetown, the Southeast Texas Male and Female College, at Jasper, St. Mary's University at Galveston, Baylor University at Waco, Wiley University (for colored students) at Marshall, the West Texas Military Academy at San Antonio, and the state agricultural and mechanical college, near Bryan. There are normal institutes at Huntsville, Prairie View, Austin, etc.

Government, etc.—The governor and other state officers are elected for a term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state has 16 votes in the lower house of the national Congress.

Pop. in 1850.—In 1850 there were 212,592 inhabitants in 1870 604,215 in 1890 818,579 in 1900 1,591,469 in 1890 2,223,323 in 1900 3,440,719. The negroes in 1900 numbered 620,722, and the foreign-born 178,357.

History.—Previous to 1836 Texas belonged to Mexico, which emancipated itself from the rule of Spain in 1821. Many Spanish missions were planted in the region in the course of the eighteenth century but as a result of the attacks of the Comanches and Apaches, the hordes of lawless adventurers from the United States, and the rising against Spain in Mexico, nothing came of this missionary activity. In the years following the achievement of Mexican independence there was a large influx of immigrants from the United States. In 1835 an insurrection broke out against Mexican rule, and the victory of Houston over Santa Anna, the Mexican president, at San Jacinto, in April 1836, secured the liberation of the country. In the same year Houston was inaugurated president of the republic of Texas. In 1845 the congress of the United States offered to admit Texas as a state into the Union. The offer was accepted and the formal admission took place before the close of the year. The war between the United States and Mexico (1846-48) grew out of the dispute regarding the boundary of Texas. In 1850 Texas sold to the United States her claims to territory outside of her present limits.

Thames, a town of England, on and 12 miles ESE. of Oxford, on the S bank of the Thames. Pop. in 1911, 2011.

Thames, thems (anc. Tam esis), the principal, though not the longest, river of England through the S part of which it flows, in a generally eastward and very tortuous course. Its head-streams the Churn and Ials (or Thames) rise on the slopes of the Cotswold Hills in Gloucestershire. The stream formed by the junction which is soon enlarged by the influx of the Colne and Leach flows in an SNE direction to a point about 3 miles NW of Oxford which is the first important town on its banks. It continues its SE. course to Reading after which its course is mostly E with great bends and windings, until it pours its waters into the North Sea through a broad estuary. The estuary proper (reckoned as far as the Nore light) expands to a width of about 8 miles but the broadening waters for some distance beyond are often regarded as belonging to the estuarine area. The estuary of the Medway opens into that of the Thames. Among the affluents of the Thames from the N are the Cherwell, Thame, and Colne. From the S the principal affluent, in addition to the Medway is the Kennet. On the S side of the entrance to the estuary is the island of Sheppey. London is situated on both banks of the Thames at 60 miles from its mouth. The river has a winding course through the city with an average width of about 1900 feet. Ocean steamers ascend the Thames to London but those of the greatest draught cannot go above Tilbury about midway between London and the mouth of the river. At London and below the accommodation provided for shipping is of the most extensive and magnificent description. The length of the Thames is about 215 miles. The tide ascends as far as Oxford, and the stream is navigated by barges some distance further up. On the E bank of the Thames below London proper are Greenwich, Woolwich, and Gravesend. Among the places situated between Reading and London (descending) are Henley, Great Marlow, Eton, Windsor, Chertsey, Kingston, Twickenham, Richmond, Brentford, and Chiswick. The Thames separates the cos of Oxford, Buckingham, Middlesex, and Essex on the N from Berkshire, Surrey, and Kent on the S.

Thames (locally pronounced thains) a tidal estuary of southeastern Connecticut, which receives the Tantic River and the united waters of the Sholuck and Quabog rivers. It extends almost due N for about 13 miles and enlarges Long Island Sound 3 miles below New London. Steamboats ascend it to Norwich. The mouth of this river forms an excellent harbor for the port of New London.

Thames, thens, a river of Ontario, flows through the peninsula between Lakes Huron and Erie, and after a SW course of 160 miles enters Lake St. Clair. It is navigable from its mouth to Chatham, whence towns London and Oxford are on its banks.

Theiss, the (Hun. Tisza) the longest affluent of the Danube, and next to it the most important river of Hungary, most of whose eastern half is drained by it and its tributaries. It rises in the Carpathian Mountains in the co. of Marmaros on the borders of Galicia, and is formed by the union of the Black and White Theiss. It is 562 km. long. Its course is W. with great bends and windings to Tokay, whence it has a SW course to Raab and thence a S. course, flowing parallel with the Danube which it joins on the left between the Buda and Csepel islands 24 miles SE. of Peterwardein. It is almost throughout extremely tortuous, and if we reckon its minor windings its length is upward of 800 miles. It is navigable for light draught steamboats for about 450 miles. The chief affluents are the Szamos, Körös, Maros, and Réga from the left and the Sajó from the right. Not far from its mouth the Theiss is connected with the Danube by the Franziskaner. The river frequently inundates its banks. It is famous for the quantity and quality of its fish. Thermopylae, ther mop e-ah (Gr Θερμοπύλαι), is "the hot gates," referring to the thermal springs located there, a famous pass of Greece, between an eastern ridge of Mount Ota and the Gulf of Lavinia (Malaga Gulf) on the road leading from Thebes to middle Hellas. In ancient times it was a narrow passage, several miles in length hemmed in on one side by precipitous rocks and on the other side by the sea, but the configuration of the ground is entirely changed, mainly through the deposits brought down by the river Arifladi (Sperchius) and there is no longer a narrow pass, but instead a level plain of considerable width. The Pass of Thermopylae is memorable for the valiant stand made there in the year 480 B.C. by Leonidas and his band of Spartans against the Persian host of Xerxes and the heroic death of the defenders. The Polyandrium, an ancient tombstone, with the remains of a square pedestal built of blocks of red marble breccia, marks the spot. In 1912 the forces of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, were defeated at Thermopylae by the Romans. Near here are remarkable hot springs, to which the pass owes its name.

Thessaly (L. Thessalia from Gr Θεσσαλία) the north easternmost division of ancient Greece, situated between Epirus on the W and the Aegean Sea on the E and bounded on the N by Macedonia. The region consists mainly of fertile plains drained by the Peneios (the modern Salambria). On the borders are lofty mountains including the range of the Pindus on the W. Mount Olympus on the N and mountains Ossa and Pelion on the E. The vale of Tempe, traversed by the Peneios, presents a break in the mountains which here border the Aegean Sea. Among the prominent towns in ancient times were Larissa (Larisa), Crannon, Pharsa, Paeonia and Pharsalus (Farsala). The cities were united in a loose confederacy. After having been united for a brief time under the tyrants of Pharsa the country passed in the middle of the fourth century A.C. under the rule of Macedonia. The Greek Revolution (1821-29) liberated the southern part of Thessaly from the Turkish yoke. The bulk of the region remained a part of Turkey until 1881 when the great powers compelled the sultan to cede most of it to Greece. Thessaly comprises the nomarchies of Larissa, Magnesia, Trikala and Karditsa. The nomarchy of Ithiatis also formed part of ancient Thessaly in a wider sense. The region as a whole is still called by its ancient name.

Thuringia (the rin-jō (Ger. Thüringen th ring en) in a strict sense the designation of a region in the central part of Hara any between the Harz Mountains on the N. and the Thuringian Forest on the S. drained mainly by the Saale and its affluents, the Unstrut. A wide application is however given to the name, and in speaking of the so-called Thuringian States we include Saxo-Weimar Saxo-Coburg Gotha Saxo-Weimar Saxo-Altenburg Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen and the two Reuss principalities. Between these states are various Rhenish districts. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the lawgivers of Thuringia played a conspicuous rôle among the German princes. Their seat was the famous castle of Wartburg near Eisenach. For a time the Minneingers also held their court there. The old line of landgraves became extinct in 1247. The landgraves then passed to the house of Wettin which ruled in the mark of Meissen and which early in the fifteenth century came into possession of the electoral duchy of Saxony. From 1485 Thuringia belonged to the Ernestine line of the house of Wettin. Here after the Reformation arose the various Saxon duchies.

Its culminations points situated to the W. of Ilmenau are the Gross Bornberg 3233 feet, and the Schneekopf which is a few feet lower. The mountains are composed chiefly of porphyry granite, and schists. They are clad to their summits with dense forests, chiefly of pine and are broken by romantic valleys. The Thuringian Forest is one of the favorite resorts of the Germans. The region is the seat of great industrial activity. The minerals include iron copper and manganese. The drainage is shared by tributaries of the Elbe, the Werra and the Main.

Tian-Shan, or Thian-Shan (the celestial mountains) an important mountain-system of Central Asia, forming in part the boundary between Russian and Chinese (or Eastern) Turkestan and extending generally northeastward from the Pamir to about 100° or 105° E., where it is lost in the snow ridges that disappear in the western region of the Gobi Desert. It forms the water-parting between the Tarim basin on one side and the basins of Dzungaria and the Balkans on the other. The system links itself on the Pamir with the Alai Mountains, trending almost directly westward, and with the Sairikol (Sirkol), a southerly range which connects with the Kun-lun, the Karakoram and the Hindu-Kush. The Begio-Ola Mountains, which border the deep depression of Lake Issyk-Kul on the N. may properly be considered to be the furthest extension northeastward of the Tian-Shan while westward, apart from the connection with the Alai, to which reference has already been made, the system is continued in the numerous ridges of the Ala-Tau and their included valleys and steppes in Samarkand and Ferghana. The central Tian-Shan has a general elevation of 15,000 to 20,000 feet, is heavily snow capped, and has many great glaciers (Somonov Nushketov Zerkashan), which in places descend to the 10,000-foot level or lower. The tree-growth (pine, spruce) is heavy to about 9000-9500 ft. The more important streams rising or having some of their head-waters in the Tian-Shan are the Naryn, Ili, Zerkashan, and Tarim. The principal pass in the Tien in the SW. on the route from Ferghana to Kashgar, Khan-Tessir, seemed to be the loftiest summit, has a height of 24,000 (?) ft.

Tiber, t'ber (anc. Tiberis and Tibris It. Tevere, Gr. Tiber) a river of central Italy rises in the Tuscan Apennines, on the slope of Monte Fumaioli at an elevation of 4160 feet (Vom del Tevere) 1 mile from the village of La Balsa, and 6 miles (direct) N. of Porto Santo Stefano. It flows generally southward, and after a course of 245 miles enters the Mediterranean Sea, 26 miles below Rome (which city the river traverses) by two mouths, which enclose a small delta, the ancient Insula Tiberis (now Isola Tiberina). The main delta arm discharges through the channel known as the Fiume Trajana, at Fiumicino, while the other arm, which is frequently dried, empties a few miles farther south after passing Ostia, the ancient port of Rome, now located about 24 miles inland. The annual advance seaward of the delta deposits is about 13 ft. It would appear that at one time the oceanic discharge of the river was at the site of the modern Porto Gallura borings at Ostia give a depth of the fluvial deposits of upward of 600 ft. The waters of the Tiber in Rome have been canalized, and are crossed by a considerable number of bridges. The river is navigable at certain seasons as far as the confluence of the Nera, 30 miles N. of Rome. Its principal tributaries are the Tevere, the Nera (anc. Nar) and the Tevere (anc. Anio) from the E. and the Nomenta, the Clotina, and the Tevere from the W. Its banks are not picturesque. The stream, usually sluggish is rapid in spring and brings down with it a colored muddy deposit, which caused it formerly to be termed the yellow Tiber. At Rome it is in general about 250 ft. across.

Tibet, or Thibet, tib'et or tib-et, an extensive region of Central Asia, included in the Chinese Empire, stretching from 75° to 105° E., and having the great bulk of the Himalayas on the S., and the Kun-lun, Alai Tag, and Pamir mountains on the N. It has Upper Burma, Assam, Szechuan, Nepal, and British India on the S. Ladakh and Butistan (Little Tibet) on the W.; Chinese Turkestan on the N.; and China proper on the E. Area, estimated at about 700,000 sq. m. It is the most elevated extensive country on the surface of the globe, and consists of a vast mountain-traversed upland or series of plains, whose general elevation in the western half is maintained at 14,000-17,000 feet, and in the E. and NE. at heights varying from about 8000 to 10,000 ft. to 14,000 ft. The high surface level is not, as was formerly supposed, the continuation of a tabular plateau, but merely that of a large number of sedimentary valleys, whose deep troughs have received and retained the debris resulting from the downwash of the surrounding and traversing mountains. The major mountain-masses or ridges that rise above the interior plains, and which are not clearly linked with the mountain-walls that form the absolute boundaries, are the so-called Tibetan Central Range in the west-entrance; the Duplex and Tanis mountains in the centre; the Frawalshi Range, possibly an extension of the Kun-lun, in the N.; the Marco Polo Range towards the NE. (defining the Koko-nor or Tsaidam basin); and the congeries or closely pressed southwardly trending ridges in the SE., through whose nearly parallel valleys the Mekong, Yang-tse-kiang and other streams take their courses. The loftiest summits within Tibet proper would appear to be the Ding Mungshu W. of Mount Kailash in the N. (approx. lat. 28° $30'$ N. lon. 81° $30'$ E.) 25,300 ft., and Ailing-Gaigri, a spur of the Karakoram in the W., about 24,000 ft. The greater part of western Tibet is of a desert character destitute of running waters and largely or almost wholly deficient in vegetation and some of these same characteristics belong to the centre and N., where a rigorous and inhospitable climate prevails. The southern and eastern parts are, on the other hand, plentifully watered by large and powerful streams, whose courses are ultimately directed across the mountain-walls. The sources of the Indus, Satlej, Ganges, and Sampo (or Brahmaputra) are in the SW. part of the table-land, in close proximity to each other the last-named flows along the northern base of the Himalayas through 13 degrees of longitude, after which it breaks through the mountain barrier in a series of wild gorges to gain the plains of Assam. The Yang-tse-kiang has its ultimate source near the centre of Tibet, with the Mekong River to the E. and the Huang-ho to the NE. the last-named issuing from the lake region of the Koko-nor basin. Tibet contains hundreds of lakes, which are scattered over almost the whole of its area, the greater number being lakes of interior drainage only—that is, without permanent outlets—and with briny or salt waters. Among the better known of these lakes are the Tengri-nor, NW of Lhasa, lying at an elevation of upward of 15,000 ft. Yamdok-tun, an exquisitely beautiful and intensely-colored sheet of water 18W of Lhasa. Measururwar the source of the Saluk (15,200 ft.) and the near-by Kakai-tai; Tsurig (or Charing) the source of the Huang-ho and the large Koko-nor in the NE. (about 10,000 ft.).

The climate throughout the greater part of Tibet, by reason of its great altitude and the snowy heights that surround it, is bleak and cold, but in the southern sections the summer days are mild and pleasant, with remarkably clear skies and not infrequent rains. Vegetation rapidly responds to the local temperature of the season, and the more favored tracts, such as the valley of the Sampo (or Brahmaputra) and the valleys that are tributary to it, as well as the basin in which Lhasa is situated, bear beautiful crops of wheat, barley and pease, or bloom forth in vast meadows of grass, which afford pasturage to flocks of cattle, sheep, and goats, and to numerous horses and camels. Groves of poplar and walnut, and less frequently orchards of peach and apricot, diversify a by no means desolate landscape, dotted with hamlets, monasteries, and the pleasing residences of the more favored in estate. The chief pursuits of the inhabitants are pastoral. The wild animals of the region are not very numerous but they embrace the yak, species of deer sheep, and goats and perhaps even one or more species of equines most closely related to the horse. A wolf-like dog is also native of this region. The animals of draught are the yak (domesticated) camel, ox, horse, and mule.

Among the more important mineral products of the land are borax, nitre, rock salt, iron, silver, copper, gold, turquoise, and lapis-lazuli. The Tibetans manufacture woollen fabrics extensively and are skilled workers in metals. The exports include the precious metals, borax, salt, wool and woollen fabrics, metallic wares, wax, furs, etc. The traffic through Tibet is extensive, and is largely monopolized by the government, the officers of state, and the monasteries. The trade with China is conducted at Lhasa and Sin-ning, a town of the Chinese province of Kansu (on the Wei-ho, a tributary of the Huang-ho). The trade between Tibet and British India is considerable. The means of transport are very primitive. Goods are carried largely on the backs of yaks and sheep. Among the most important places in Tibet are Lhasa, the capital, estimated to have a population (1904-05) of 11,000-25,000, and situated at a height of 11,500 feet; Gyangse or Gyantse, about 110 miles SW of Lhasa (12,000 ft.); Shigatse, NW of Gyangse; Dingri NW of Mount Everest; and Gartok, almost in the extreme W. Tibet is the principal seat of that form of Buddhism known as Lamaism. At the head of the church are the Dalai Lama, who resides at Lhasa, and the Panchen Lama, who resides at Shigatse. The former virtually holds the primacy. The hierarchical structure is a vast one. The country is full of monasteries or lamaseries, whose inmates lead a life of celibacy. These lamaseries some of which are great collections of lofty buildings, are seats of learning. By the side of Buddhism there is an other and more ancient religion, widely diffused, which is known as the Bon creed. This religion was developed from Shamanism and has received Buddhist influences. Tibet is a very thickly populated country. The population is generally estimated at 2,000,000 or 3,000,000, although by some it is supposed to be considerably larger. The Tibetans are a branch of the Mongol race. The administration is virtually in the hands of the natives, the Chinese government controlling the foreign relations of the country and maintaining small garrisons of Chinese troops. The nominal head of the government is the Dalai Lama, but the practical conduct of affairs is lodged in a regent, appointed by the Chinese government and selected from among the lamas, and in a council of ministers. In 1904 England exerted from Tibet various concessions in the matter of trade and in that of the foreign relations of the country. Chinese domination in Tibet dates only from the eighteenth century.

Ticino, to-chen-see (see Ticino), a river of Switzerland and Italy rises by two little head-streams on the declivity of Mount St. Gotthard and in the Rufina Pass, flows SE and then SW through the canton of Ticino, traverses Lago Maggiore, and, after forming the boundary between Lombardy and Piedmont, joins the Po in Lombardy, 24 miles SSE of Pavia, the principal town on its banks. Total course, about 150 miles. It is navigable from Lago Maggiore. The uppermost part of its valley is called Leventina. Hannibal's career in Italy began with his victory over the Romans on the banks of this river in 218 B.C.

Ticino (Ger and Fr. Ticino), a canton of Switzerland in the SE, on the Italian side of the Alps, whose ranges separate it from the cantons of Uri, Grisons, and Valais. It is bounded on the E. by Lombardy and on the SW by Piedmont. Area, 1669 sq. m. The surface is covered in great part by the so-called Alps of Ticino. On the northern border is the mass of the St. Gotthard and the Adula mountain group extends into the NE part. The S. extremity belongs to the plain of Lombardy. The canton is almost wholly drained by the Ticino and its tributaries. Its S. part comprises the larger portion of the Lago di Lugano, with the N. extremity of Lago Maggiore. The region presents a great diversity of climate, according to the elevation, from temperate to very cold. The products comprise all kinds of cereals, tobacco, fruit (including subtropical kinds), chestnuts, and wine. Silk-culture is a considerable industry. The forests are very extensive, but until recently have been greatly neglected. The manufactures are unimportant. The St. Gotthard railway traverses the canton. The population in 1900 was 123,243, nearly all Italians by speech and Roman Catholics. The legislative body is the Great Council, whose members are elected for a term of 4 years. There is an executive council, also elected by the people. The capital is Bellinzona. Other considerable towns are Lugano and Locarno. These places present an Italian appearance. The canton of Ticino as such has existed only a little over a century.

Tien-tsin, to-ai-tsun' a city and treaty-port of China, province of Chi-li, on the Pei ho, where the river is joined by the Hun-ho, the Ho-to-ho (Tse-yo-ho) and the Grand Canal. It is about 76 miles SE. of Peking and almost as far from the mouth of the Pei ho, following its extremely tortuous course. Tien-tsin is the port of Peking and is connected with it by rail, as well as with Manchuria. The city which is surrounded by a lofty wall with towers, presents a mass appearance with its great expanse of low houses. The foreign quarter, however, which is outside of the main city is well built and provided with the apparatus of European civilization. Tien-tsin is a great emporium of the internal trade of China and one of the leading ports of the empire. It is a great mart for salt and tea. The population is estimated at about 750,000. In 1858 China concluded treaties at Tien-tsin with Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States. Russia obtained the custom of the Amur country. The city figured prominently in the hostilities between the foreign powers and the Chinese in 1900.

Tierra-Bomba, to-la ná bom-bá, an island in the Caribbean Sea, off the NW coast of Colombia, near the harbor of Cartagena.

Tierra del Fuego, to-la ná dñ fwa'go (the land of fire; Port. Terra do Fogo, tén ná do fô go) a group of islands at the S extremity of South America, between lat. 52° 40' and 56° S., belonging in (greater) part to Chile and in part to the Argentine Republic. It is separated from the main-land by the Strait of Magellan and its other sides are washed by the Atlantic Ocean on the E. the Pacific on the W. and the Southern (Antarctic) Ocean on the S. Besides numerous small islands, it consists of one very large island, East Tierra del Fuego, or King Charles South Land, measuring from E to W, near its S shore, about 270 miles and of 5 very considerable smaller islands,--Navarin and Hoste on the S, separated from East Tierra del Fuego by Beagle Channel, and Clarance, Santa Ines, and Desolación (Desolation) on the W. The extreme points of the island-group are Cape Pillar in the NW (on Desolación) Catherine Point (on East Tierra del Fuego) in the NE Cape St. John (San Juan) in the E. (on Staten Island) and Cape Horn in the S (on Horn Island). All of the islands are deeply penetrated by arms of the sea, and are composed of mountains which are either covered with perpetual ice and snow or are clothed with stunted forests, chiefly of evergreen beech. The loftiest summits appear to be the singularly imposing and double-peaked Mount Sarmiento (5910 feet) and Mount Darwin (about 6300 feet). Although they are called land of fire, there are no volcanoes in the islands. The main system of the Andes is carried through the western part of the group which is seemingly undergoing disintegration, whereas the Patagonian plains are continued into East Tierra del Fuego. The climate, though disagreeable, is not particularly rigorous, the mean January (summer) temperature being about 55°, and the July (winter) temperature 31° and there is a fairly abundant rainfall. Some of the hardiest cereals come to maturity and there is considerable land under cultivation. Gold is found in places and there is also some lignite. The plant and animal-life is on the whole limited and bears testimony to the long-continued separation of the islands from the main-land. The true Fuegians or aboriginal inhabitants, who somewhat resemble the Patagonians, do not at this time, probably exceed 1000 in number. The civilized population is almost entirely centred in Argentine Tierra del Fuego,--the territory lying E. of a line connecting the entrance of Magellan Strait with the middle of Beagle Channel,--and in 1900 numbered 2150. The Chilean section forms the territory of Magallanes, with the seat of government at Punta Arenas on the main-land. The islands were discovered by Magellan in 1520.

Tiess, to-á see, a town of the island of Sardinia, 16 miles SSE of Sassari. Pop. about 3700.

It contains manufactures of carriages, agricultural implements, wooden goods, well-drilling machinery, candy-shops, pottery, glass, box-board and paper, etc. Pop. in 1900, 10,000.

Tiflis, tíf'le, a government of the Russian Empire, in Transcaucasia, bounded NE by the coast of the Caspian and occupying the central part of the former Kingdom of Georgia. Area, about 17,000 sq. m. It is a region of mountains and valleys. The principal river is the Kura. The forests cover a large area. In addition to the regular agricultural crops the region produces wine, fruit, and silk. Large numbers of cattle, sheep and goats are reared. The inhabitants are mainly Georgians and Armenians, only about 5 per cent. being Russians. Capital, Tiflis. Pop. in 1897, 1,040,943.

Tiflis, the capital of the Russian government of Tiflis, Transcaucasia, and the administrative seat of the general government of the Caucasus, formerly capital of Georgia, situated on both banks of the river Kura about 276 miles (direct) WNW of Baku. Lat. 41° 43' N., lon. 44° 48' E. It is connected by rail with Baku and with the ports of Batum and Poti on the Black Sea. The city is picturesque situated in the basin-like valley at the southern foot of the Caucasus. The streets rise in terraces one above another, and vineyards and orchards on the slopes tend attraction to the appearance of the place. Until recently Tiflis was an oriental town of little pretensions, but under Russian rule, which began with the opening of the nineteenth century it has blossomed out into a great modern city while still preserving its ancient quarters. It has hotels and fine shops, theatres (Russian, Armenian, and Georgian) banks, newspapers in various languages, tramways, and a fire department. The principal objects of architectural interest are the churches, which are among the most ancient to be found anywhere. Prominent among them is the cathedral of Zion once the seat of the Catholics of Georgia. There are a great number of Greek and Armenian churches and one or two mosques survive. Among the attractions of Tiflis are the public gardens and the botanical garden. The city has a numerous schools, a conservatory of music, a Caucasian museum, a railroad institute, a agricultural station, and a physical observatory. There are extensive manufactures of leather and tobacco, and cotton-spinning and brewing are carried on. Tiflis is an important trading centre. The city has hot sulphur springs. The population rose from about 25,000 in 1828 to 88,561 in 1888, and to 160,845 in 1897. Nearly two-fifths of the inhabitants are Armenians, and the Russians and Georgians each comprise about one-fourth. A number of nationalities are represented in the remainder.

Tigris, a river of Mesopotamia, flowing generally northward, passing Diarbekr (on the NW bank), Mosul, Tefris, and Bagdad, and uniting at Kurna (about 80 miles NW of the Persian Gulf) with the Euphrates to form the Shat-el-Arab. The main portion of the region between the Tigris and the Euphrates, called Al-Jezira, is the ancient Mesopotamia. The principal affluents of the Tigris are the Great and Little Zab and the Dجلة (Dysla) all coming from the E. The Tigris is a rapid stream and, although available for boats in one form or another for most of its course, does not present the full advantages of open navigation. Steamers ascend the river regularly to Bagdad, and smaller vessels to Mosul. Between Mosul and Diarbekr the river-service is almost entirely one of down-stream and executed by an old and primitive system of rafting. The banks of the river in the upper part of its course are thinly peopled, but the pasture-grounds are rich and well suited for the nomadic tribes which visit them. The river attains its greatest height between the middle and the end of May and after this time it falls till the middle of June. It brings down vast quantities of deposit. In its lower course it unites by means of a number of semi-permanent natural ways (or "canals") with the Euphrates. The region traversed by the Tigris is one of great historic interest, and on its banks are the ruins of ancient Nineveh (opposite Mosul), Seleucia, and Ctesiphon. Length, about 1180 miles.

Tokyo, or Tokio, to'kō-n (prior to 1868 called Yedo, Yeddo, Jeddo, yeddo) the capital of the Japanese Empire, is situated in the E part of Honshu, the main island on the Bay of Tokyo (or Yedo) and on both sides of the Sumida River (Sumidagawa). The city occupies a very large area, a considerable portion of which is not built over or is in the form of parks and gardens, and constitutes with its immediate surroundings, the district of Tokyo-fu. Lat. of observatory 35° 39' 17" N., lon. 139° 44' 30" E. It is traversed by a considerable number of canals, which are bridged at frequent intervals. Of the 13 or more districts of the city only two—Hongo, which contains the famous Edo-temple and Fukagawa (Fukage)—are located on the E side of the Sumida. Tokyo is distinctively divided into 3 sections, (1) Siro, the imperial citadel occupying nearly the geographic centre of the city (2) Soto-Siro outside the citadel, a fairly large district surrounding the first and (3) Midai, the outer parts. The Midai were formerly taken up largely by the residences of the daimios, but these have given place to government buildings, colleges, barracks, foundries, steam mills and factories, etc. The three sections here indicated were formerly enclosed or defended by walls and moats, but these have in greater part been removed. Outside of these districts there are miles of brick, stone, adobe, and wooden buildings, mostly in European styles of construction, the growth of the few years since Tokyo became the seat of government and the place of abode of the ministers of foreign countries. The streets of the modern Tokyo are regular, fairly wide, and clean and some of them are traversed by tramways. Tokyo is connected by railway and telegraph with Yokohama and other principal commercial cities. Apart from the palace and other government buildings, a number of temples and mortuary shrines, there are few noteworthy edifices in the city. The imperial university (or University of Tokyo) is the most important educational institution of the empire, has full faculties, and ranks with the leading universities of the western world. It was founded in 1857-58 by 3771 students. Tokyo is the seat of geological, geographical, seismological, astronomical, meteorological and statistical societies, of national trigonometric, hydrographic, and geological surveys, and of the Asiatic Society of Japan. A large number of books and periodicals are published here. The foreign trade of Tokyo is very limited on account of the shallowness of the water in the bay and river which prevents large vessels from approaching within about 5 miles, but the manufacturing industries are being developed and there are many considerable establishments employing steam and modern machinery of the most approved kinds. The population some years before the city was opened to foreigners was stated to be about 1,500,000, but many of the natives left the city in 1868 and the three or four succeeding years, so that in 1872 a careful enumeration showed but 774,361. Pop. by the census of 1884, 902,887; in 1901, 1,155,296; in 1903 (Jan. 1) 1,839,288 (city proper).

Tong-king, or Tongkin, ton kin, a possession of France in the N.E. part of French Indo-China, bounded on the N. by the Chinese provinces of Kwang-chi and Yun-nan, on the W. by Laos, on the S. by Annam and on the E. by the Gulf of Tonking. The western boundary is not precisely determined. Area, between 40,000 and 50,000 sq. m. Prior to 1883-85 when a French protectorate over the region was established it constituted the northernmost province or viceroyalty of the kingdom of Annam. Tonking extends from the parallel of 20° N. lat. nearly to the Tropic of Cancer and lies in great part in the drainage-basin of the Song ka or Red River. It is on the whole of a mountainous character, containing the general features of China southward, and rises in a number of summits to 5000 and 6000 feet elevation or more. On the Gulf border it falls to a low-lying flat, which at periods of heavy rainfall is frequently flooded by the river waters to a depth of several feet. The soil is exceedingly fertile and the surface, excepting on the mountains, where some virgin forest (yielding teak and other valuable woods) still remains, is in great part under cultivation. Rice is the most important agricultural product, and the rice-plantations occupy large areas in the Song ka delta-region. Sugar tobacco, coffee, the poppy, hemp, ramie, and cotton are also cultivated together with the betel palm and silk mulberry. The mineral resources are gold (found in many of the river beds), silver (at Ngan-con) copper, gentianite, iron, and coal the last named being mined (chiefly at Hien-gai) to an extent of 150,000-200,000 tons or more annually. The principal European industries of Tonking are concentrated at Ha-noi and Hai-phong (the chief port) where large cotton, silk and other mills, a match-factory, breweries and distilleries, foundries, etc. have been established. The silk product amounts in some years to 750,000 kilograms. Tonking has on the whole a tropical climate, but there is a well marked winter or cold period, when the temperature descends to nearly 40°. The rainfall is very heavy. The population of Tonking is estimated to number from eight to ten millions. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Annamese. In the mountains dwell the Muong. The European number only a few thousand. Capital, Ha-noi, which is also the capital of French Indo-China.

About a quarter of a century ago the incursions of the Black Flag, a predatory Chinese soldiery who infested the delta of the Song ka, which France was eager to secure for its commerce afforded that state a coveted pretext for bringing Tonking within the sphere of its authority. In 1883 the French seized the island of Ha-noi. War ensued between France and Annam, and France became involved in a struggle with China which claimed suzerainty over Annam. After much severe fighting, French dominion in Tonking was established in 1885.

Toulouze, too hooz (see Toulon) a city of France, capital of the department of Haute-Garonne and formerly of the province of Languedoc, situated in a fertile valley, on the right bank of the river Garonne 120 miles NE of Bordeaux. Lat. of observatory 43° 38' 45" N lon 1° 27' 39" E. Three bridges cross a sixteenth-century stone structure of 2 arches, connect it with the suburb of Saint-Cyprien on the opposite bank of the river. Toulouze has for the most part narrow ill-paved streets and poorly built districts, but it is interested by fine avenues. The principal pal edifices are the church of St. Sernin, one of the finest specimens of Romanesque architecture, begun in the eleventh century and restored by Viollet-le-Duc; the church of La Dalbade, with a fine square tower and a beautiful Renaissance portal; the cathedral of St. Etienne, a composite of different styles; the Capitole or town-hall, the seat of the Académie des Jeux Floraux ("Floral Games") one of the oldest literary institutions of Europe; the donjon, restored by Viollet-le-Duc, containing the municipal archives; the Palais de Justice, and the handsome Hôtel d'Académie. The educational institutions of the city comprise the university, founded in the thirteenth century with about 2000 students; a veterinary college, academies of sciences and of inscriptions and belles-lettres; and the Musée des Beaux-Arts, with a fine collection of antiquities and pictures. Toulouse, owing to its position in the centre of southern France at the junction of the Canal de Midi and the Canal Latéral, is an important commercial and industrial town. Much of the transit trade to Spain passes through it. It has a large national powder-factory, a national tobacco-factory, a cannon foundry and manufactures of paper, agricultural machines, leather and saddlery, stained-glass, earthenware, etc. The town is the seat of the archbishop of Toulouse and Narbonne. Pop. in 1901 127,666 (commune, 149,841).

Toulouse rose to importance before the beginning of Roman dominion in Gaul. It was the capital of the kingdom of the Visigoths for nearly a century from about A. D. 418. Later it was the residence of the dukes of Aquitaine under the Merovingian kings. For several centuries it was the capital of the County of Toulouse, which gradually emerging from its position of dependence on the French crown rose to be a large and powerful principality whose dominions comprised Languedoc and parts of Gascony and Provence. The county was united with the French crown in 1271. In 1814 Bonaparte made an unsuccessful stand against Wellington at Toulouse.

Tours, too (anc. Caesarodunum, afterwards Terones), a city of France, capital of the department of Indre-et-Loire and formerly of Touraine, situated on the left bank of the Loire and near the right bank of the Cher 70 miles SW of Orleans. It is connected with the suburb of Salnt-Symphorien on the opposite bank of the Loire, by a fine fifteen-arched stone bridge. The mild and equable climate of the town has rendered it a favorite resort of foreigners, especially of the English. The principal features of Tours are the superb Gothic cathedral, begun in the twelfth century and finished in the sixteenth with a richly ornamented facade, magnificent stained-glass windows, and two imposing towers; the detached towers of St. Martin and Charlemagne, the only remains of the famous basilica of St. Martin, demolished in 1862; the archiepiscopal palace, with archaeological, paleontological, and art collections; the museum, the theatre, and the statue of Balzac, a native of Tours, by Fournier. In the immediate vicinity of the town is the curious chateau of Pissais-le-Tours, the residence of Louis XI. Tours has an art school, the Collège de St. Louis de Gonzague, a preparatory school of medicine and pharmacy and a library of 125,000 volumes. The industries comprise the manufacture of articles of iron and steel, leather, chemicals, silk, woollens, stained-glass, pottery, etc. A famous book-binding establishment is located here. Tours derived its name from the Gallic tribe of the Turones. In very early times it became the seat of a bishop and later of an archbishop. The battle in which Charles Martel defeated the invading Saracens in 732, often known as the battle of Tours, was fought between Tours and Poitiers. The city figured as the seat of the government of National Defence in the autumn of 1870. At the beginning of 1871 it was in the hands of the Germans. Pop. in 1901 68,409 (commune, 64,696).

Transvaal (trans-vaal) Colony, a British possession in southern Africa, adjoining Portuguese East Africa on the E. and having Natal and the Orange River Colony on the S. The Limpopo River separates it from Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate on the N and NW while the Vaal River constitutes the greater part of the southern boundary. Area, about 180 000 sq m. The districts of Utrecht and Vryheid and part of the district of Wakker stream, which were included in the Transvaal Republic, were transferred to Natal in Jan. 1901. The greater part of the Transvaal section is a fairly level plateau or table-of the Transvaal region is a fairly lofty plateau or table-land, which in the E. and E. lies at elevations of from 4000 to 6000 feet and in the northern sections between 1500 and 4000 ft. The Urukenburg (Kwatsimbis) range, rising in the Mafuburg to upward of 5,000 ft. traverses the eastern section in a N. and S. direction and the Lebombo Mountains form the boundary with Portuguese East Africa. The famous Witwatersrand (range) rising to about 5000 ft. is the water-parting in the W. between the Limpopo and the Vaal systems of waters. Other mountain ranges or elevations are the Magalimburg and Wilfontainsburg. The mountains S.W. of the colony are occupied by a vast and extremely monotonous flat. The region is well watered by the Limpopo and Vaal and their tributaries (the largest of which is the Olifant, a tributary to the Limpopo) and, in the E. by the Komati, Sabi, and Umtata. In general the Transvaal enjoys a fairly healthy climate, which is, however, marked by great summer heat (especially in the month of January) and heavy precipitation and malarial conditions are by no means wanting during the rainy season. The winter months are invigorating and bracing. At Pretoria, at an elevation of 44 00 ft. the mean maximum temperature during the three summer months is about 89° and the mean minimum for the three winter months, about 42°; the rainfall is about 26 inches. Among the more distinctive types of the native vegetation are the numerous forms of acacia and the eucalyptus. The region is well suited to agricultural and stock-raising pursuits, most of the European grains and vegetables thriving well. Before the Anglo-Boer war vast herds of cattle and other stock were pastured on the veldt. The live-stock in the colony in 1903 was estimated at cattle, 200 000 sheep 300 000 horses, 50 000 and pigs, 1000. The great wealth of the region is in its mineral resources, which comprise gold, diamonds, coal, copper, iron, and tin. Comparatively little attention is paid to mining except for gold, diamonds, and coal. The chief gold centres are the Witwatersrand (one of the richest gold areas in the world) with Johannesburg as the main mining camp or centre and Barberton. The product from the various mines during the period of 1884-98 was valued at about £350 000 000. In the year 1903 it amounted to 2,972,597 fine ounces and in 1904 to 2,424,330 fine ounces. The number of persons working in the mines at the close of 1903 was 88,336 (12,703 whites). Nearly all the diamonds obtained in the colony are from the Pretoria district, the value of the product in 1902 was about £1 200 000. Barberton, Middleburg, and Potchefburg districts furnish most of the coal that is mined. There are about 1000 miles of railway in operation

The colony is administered by a governor assisted by a lieutenant-governor and an executive council. There is a legislative council, consisting in part of official and in part of elected members. Pop in 1904, 1,302,716, of whom 299,327 were whites. Capital, Pretoria. The largest town is Johannesburg, with a population of 158,000.

1. Boer Republics - 1845-55 the Boers (descendants of the Dutch settlers in South Africa) having migrated from Cape Colony on account of their unwillingness to endure British rule, founded the Orange Free State and the Transvaal (South African) Republic. England recognised the two republics. In 1877 the British who had come to the assistance of the Transvaal Republic, which was hard pressed by the Boers, annexed it to their dominions. In 1898 the Boers rose in arms. The annexation to the British at Majuba Hill in 1881 was followed by the recognition of the autonomy of the Transvaal Republic. A few years later the discovery of the gold treasures of the Witwatersrand inaugurated a great influx of immigrants. They came in such numbers that the foreign population before very long outnumbered the Boers. The rise of Johannesburg was a parallel to that of San Francisco. The Boers refused to admit the new-comers, or Uitlanders, as they were called to a share in the government, fearing lest their successful preponderance would mean the speedy extinction of the Boer Republic as such. In 1895-96 occurred the Jameson raid, which was to be the beginning of an Uitlander uprising, to be followed by British annexation. It proved abortive. In 1899 England intervened actively in behalf of the Uitlanders. President Kruger was compelled to make far-reaching concessions but England made further demands, claiming sovereignty over the Transvaal Republic. The Boers finally decided to take up arms and joined by their brethren in the Orange Free State they threw themselves upon the British with extraordinary energy. At the close of 1899 and in the early part of 1900 they achieved a succession of victories, but they finally succumbed to vastly superior numbers not however until they had shown themselves to be a nation of heroes. In June 1900, Lord Roberts entered 1 return Both Boer republics were annexed to the British Empire. The Transvaal Republic became the Transvaal Colony. The guerrilla warfare continued till 1902.

Transylvania, trans-ill-va-ne-ə (L. the country beyond the forest) Her St. Andrew's see ben bün an the seven castles Her St. Erdély se döl forest-land) e former principality attached to the Hungarian crown since 1867 an integral part of the Hungarian kingdom. It is bounded on the N and W by Hungary proper on the N and E by Rumania, from which it is separated by the Carpathian Mountains, and on the S by Bukovina. It is situated between the parallels of 45° and 46° N lat. Area, about 22,000 sq. m. Transylvania is a picturesque region of high mountains and valleys, the Carpathians curving round it like a great wall and corresponding it with their ramifications. The portion of the range which extends E and W along the southern border is known as the Transylvanian Alps. The highest summits here exceed 8000 feet in elevation. The greater part of the region belongs to the basin of the Tisza, being drained by the Kaszov, Maros, and Körös rivers. The southernmost portion is drained by the Aluta River, which breaks through the Transylvanian Alps in the Red Tower Pass and then continues to the Walachian plain to the Danube. The climate is temperate and beautiful, but in the higher regions the winter snows. The soil is generally very fertile. The forests which clothe the mountains comprise nearly two-fifths of the total area. More than one-fourth is agricultural land and the bulk of the remainder is nearly evenly divided between natural pastures and meadows. Beneficial crops of rye, wheat, oats, and maize are produced as well as of potatoes. Among other farm products are pulses and flax. The orchards yield a variety of fruits including apricots and peaches, and the product of the vineyards is highly prized. Transylvania is rich in live-stock including cattle, horses of fine breed, sheep, and short-tailed sheep and swine. The buffalo is not an uncommon sight on the farms in some districts. Bee-keeping is an important industry. The forests consist mainly of coniferous trees, beeches, and oaks, and yield valuable timber. They harbor large numbers of game, including the brown bear, wolf and wild boar. Transylvania is rich in minerals, which include salt, gold, silver, lead, copper, coal and lignite. It comprises part of the vast deposit of salt which crops out over a large extent of the Carpathians. Manufactures are not extensively developed.

The population of Transylvania in 1906 was 2,436,825, including nearly 400,000 Rumanians (Wallachs) upward of 600,000 Hungarians (Magyars) and upward of 120,000 Germans. Included among the Hungarians are the Szeklers, a people of Magyar stock. The Germans are mainly the descendants of immigrants from Germany who settled here in the Middle Ages. The region where they settled dwell, in the southern part of the country is known as Saxonyland. The largest towns are Klausenburg (Kolozsvár), Kronstadt (Brassó) and Hermannstadt (Nagy-Szeben) both in Saxonyland, and Maros-Vásárhely Klausenburg is the seat of a university. The Hungarians belong to the Greek church. The bulk of the Hungarians are Roman Catholics, but a large fraction are Protestants and there is a large body of Unitarians, Transylvania having been the cradle of Unitarianism.

In antiquity Transylvania formed part of Dacia. The Dacians were subdued by the Roman emperor Trajan at the beginning of the second century. The Roman dominion lasted less than two centuries. The country passed under the sway of one barbarous race after another and during the second half of the Middle Ages formed part of the kingdom of Hungary. The Hungarian kings promoted the development of Transylvania by inviting Germans to settle in the region. The disaster which befell the Hungarians at Mohács at the hands of the Turks in 1526 broke up the Hungarian realm. Transylvania becoming a separate principality under the protection of the sultan. The dominions of the princes of Transylvania, some of whom played a considerable rôle, embraced part of Hungary proper. The collapse of the power of Turkey in the latter part of the seventeenth century enabled Austria to gain possession of Transylvania (which was secured to it in the peace of Karlowitz, concluded with the sultan in 1699). The country remained permanently under the rule of the Hapsburgs. In 1867-68 Transylvania was completely incorporated with Hungary.

Trebisond, trēb'zōnd (Turk. Trēbisān trē-rīb-ān or Trābisān L. Trāp'sōn) is named with reference to the configuration of its site, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey capital of the vilayet of Trebisond, on the eastern part of the coast of the Black Sea, 120 miles NW of Erzerum. It presents externally a striking appearance perched on a plateau like height, with rocky declivities on two sides, enclosed by medieval walls and dominated by an old castle in the rear. The Christian quarters of Trebisond are outside of the walls. The city has preserved interesting ruins of Byzantine ecclesiastical architecture. The old Greek churches have in great part been transformed into mosques. The dwellings are mostly one-storied structures, standing in little walled gardens. The bazars and khans are in the Christian quarter. Trebisond is the seat of an active trade. Its location long ago rendered it a great entrepôt of the commerce between Europe and Persia, but its position in this respect has greatly declined in consequence of the changes brought about by steam transportation. The exports are cloths, cattle, hazel nuts, tobacco, carpets, silks, etc. The city suffers under the disadvantage of possessing no real harbor. The population is estimated at about 35,000 of whom more than one-half are Turks. The Christians consist mainly of Greeks and Armenians, the former greatly outnumbering the latter. The city was colonized in remote antiquity by Greeks from Sinope. It was here that Xenophon and the Ten Thousand Greeks reached the sea in their memorable retreat. From 1264 to 1461 the city was the capital of the Great empire of Trebisond, an offshoot of the Byzantine Empire.
